PRESIDENT MEETS LEADERS

National Committee Visits Him After Opening Session.

Alabama Is for Senator Hanna, but Other States Are Still with Mr. Roosevelt.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—A big crowd filled the corridors of the Arlington to-day several hours before the National Republican Committee convened. The talk indulged in regarded more the favorable action of the next convention than the action of the committee on the selection of a convention city, and Mr. Roosevelt's chances of getting the nomination were generally regarded as certain as Chicago's likelihood of getting the convention, which is conceded.

There is unquestionably a feeling of admiration for Hanna, but with the men who are recognized leaders of Republican thought and action in the councils of the party Roosevelt is apparently stronger today than at any previous time.

When Mr. Hanna entered the room and assumed his place at the desk of the presiding officer he was greeted with applause. Secretary Heath was on the platform with Mr. Hanna, engaged in his routine duties of preparing the roll of the committee. Mr. Hanna's opening address was brief and pertinent. He said that all the interest to the Republican Party that centred in the committee was expressed in the single word "success," and all that was necessary to bring about success in the next campaign was to stand pat on the principles and policies of the party. This declaration was applauded. Following Mr. Hanna's address the routine business of the committee was proceeded with without oratorical accompaniments.

Secretary Heath read a communication from S. R. Palmer of Porto Rico, representing the American Federal Party, which related to its association with the Republican Party. It was stated that as long as Porto Rico was governed by the Foraker act it could not be connected with the politics of the United States, as Porto Ricans were not recognized as citizens of the United States.

Matters requiring the consideration of the committee were referred to the executive session, which will be held to-morrow afternoon.

The committee at 2:30 o'clock assembled at the hotel and proceeded to the White House to call on the President. After the committee had waited a few minutes in the Green Parlor the President entered, and was heartily greeted by the committee. Chairman Hanna said as he took Mr. Roosevelt's hand:

"Mr. President, I have the honor to present en masse the members of the Republican National Committee. In my experience with this body of men I have found them all true, loyal Republicans, ready to support the principles of the Republican Party at all times."

President Roosevelt replied:

"Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: It is a peculiar pleasure to me to greet here the men to whom not merely the party, but the country, has owed so much in the immediate past, and the men to whom both party and country will owe so much in the immediate future."

"You had better pass around the room, Mr. President, and shake hands with each one," remarked Senator Hanna.

"All right," responded the President. "I was just debating which was the best way to get at them."

"You will have no trouble in getting at these fellows," responded Senator Hanna; "they are all anxious to see you."

As the laugh subsided the President responded bowing to Senator Hanna:

He then passed around the room and shook the hand of each member, after which a photograph of the committee was taken on the portico of the White House, with the President and Senator Hanna in the centre. Secretary Heath did not accompany the committee to the White House.

Some of the committee attempted to draw from the President an opinion on the prospects of his nomination next year, but he declared that the subject was one that he would not discuss. The people, he said, must decide who will be their candidates.

Members of the committee were free in expressing their own opinions in regard to the popular feeling in their respective States for President Roosevelt. Mr. Sheldon of New York scouts the idea that Roosevelt cannot carry the Empire State. He is confident that Mr. Roosevelt will not only be the unanimous choice of the New York delegation for the nomination but that he will be given a very large majority at the election.

There were a few discordant notes from Southern States. Mr. Turley, the committeeman from Mississippi, said: "There is a strong feeling against the nomination of President Roosevelt in my State at present, due chiefly to the fact that he has appointed a Democrat as referee in all disagreements about patronage."

Committeeman Dennmick of Alabama said: "The Republicans of Alabama are not satisfied with President Roosevelt. They feel that the President has not treated them fairly, that he has no confidence in their judgment and ability to manage the affairs of the party in Alabama properly, and therefore feel that he has no claim on their support."

About fifty of the members of the committee which is here from Chicago to urge the holding of the Republican National Convention in that city called on Speaker Cannon in a body to pay their respects. Addressing the visitors, Mr. Cannon expressed the opinion that they would succeed in taking the convention to Chicago.

"The work of that convention," he said, "has already been mapped out. Public sentiment, as voiced by the great multitude of the voters has already expressed approval of the Administration and a desire for the nomination of President Roosevelt for a second term.

"The Republican Party has many great leaders. Among them that great leader of a sister State, equal in business ability, statesmanship, and devotion to public service of any citizen within our borders. He is able to speak, and he has spoken for himself. His voice was in harmony with the great sentiment of the majority. I have no doubt that in common with other great leaders in whom the Republican Party and the people have confidence he will in the future, as in the past, devote his earnest efforts and give his loyal support to the common success."

MANY ISSUES IN SENATE.

Democrats Present Several Resolutions and Will Confer To-day.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—This was a field day for issues in the Senate. Democrats vied with each other in bringing them to the front until there was a broad smile all over the Republican side of the Chamber.

It was decided to hold another conference to-morrow in Senator Gorman's room in the hope of reaching a line-up on the politics that must be played for the rest of the session.

Senator Gorman has finally decided to make a keen fight to pass the resolution for an investigation of the Post Office Department, and this, with the Hoar resolution in regard to Panama, is at the top of the programme.

Senator Bacon by a resolution which he introduced to-day suggested that the trust question can be made to yield campaign material if properly worked. He wants the President to send to the Senate all of the information gathered during the past Summer by Commissioner of Corporations Garfield and show whether the anti-trust legislation of last session has done anybody any good.

Senator Tillman cut out a month's work for all concerned by demanding a great deal of light on the constructive recess of last Monday. He wants all the legal aspects of the case passed on by the Judiciary Committee.

Senator Culberson asked by a resolution which he presented that more information be forthcoming on the Panama incident in the hope that it may be shown that the President was too hasty in bringing the new republic into being, and that the United States has been discredited in the whole episode.

Senator Patterson advanced a local issue in his State for consideration. He presented a resolution intended to seek information as to whether there was a republican form of government in Colorado at the present time, in view of the use of State troops to put down laboring men who are exercising the right of public discussion.

The main question before the Democratic conference to-morrow is expected to be the policy of delaying the ratification of the Panama treaty. It is not the purpose of the Democratic Senators to defeat the treaty out and out, but to put stumbling stones in its path and keep it back as long as possible.

If an adjournment can be reached next Summer without a final vote on the treaty the Democrats will be satisfied. They can then go into the campaign and criticise the President for the haste and irregularity attendant on the creation and recognition of the Republic of Panama.

This ingenious course is the conception of Senator Gorman, and it has already received many adherents.

GARVIN FOR PRESIDENCY.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The name of Gov. Lucius F. C. Garvin of Rhode Island has for several days been seriously under consideration for President by many Democrats in Congress. A speech by Representative Granger, the Democratic Congressman from that State, to-day gave new impetus to the Garvin talk.

Those Democrats who are inclined to favor Mr. Garvin's nomination advanced these reasons:

First—He is the only Democrat, except Judge Parker, who has carried a Northern or Eastern State since Bryan was first nominated for President.

Second—While Rhode Island's electoral vote is small, if Mr. Garvin is satisfactory to that State, he may be supposed to be satisfactory to New York and other Eastern States.

Third—He is conspicuously identified with the issue of anti-graft, and if the Democratic campaign cry next year is "Turn the rascals out!" he will be a platform in himself.

Fourth—That he has always been regular and should be satisfactory to the West and South.

Gov. Garvin, his friends say, has waged a persistent war on corruption and graft, and they point to the fact that in the campaign recently closed the Republicans made that the issue against him, charging that he was staining the fair name of the State by his attacks on her political corruption.

Mr. Granger's speech to-day was devoted to proving that the tendency was toward Democracy in his State. He showed that while the Republican vote had increased only 20 per cent. in four years, the Democratic vote had increased 100 per cent., and he gave figures to show that if the "rotten borough" system of representation were abolished the Rhode Island General Assembly would be overwhelmingly Democratic.

When told to-night that Democrats were seriously considering Gov. Garvin's name Mr. Granger replied: "Yes, I know it. Several Democratic conferees in the House have approached me on the subject. It of course seems incredible that the Democratic Party should ever go to New England for Presidential timber. But if it should it could not get any abler, better, or cleaner man than Gov. Garvin.

"He has been thirteen times in the Legislature and all his life has fought official corruption. He is a downright, forceful man and stands by principle at any cost to himself."

It is believed that the Garvin boom originated with a well-known Western man who is himself identified with the issue of anti-graft. Some of those who have been discussing the subject are in the attitude of inquirers eagerly seeking information about the Governor's availability. Others are enthusiastically for him.

UNIVERSAL TOBACCO HEARING.

Ex-Director Testifies That Butler Said Stockholders Must Take Chances.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 11.—William D. Judkins, one of the original Directors of the Universal Tobacco Company, was placed on the stand by the complainants in the receivership proceedings to-day.

Mr. Judkins testified that he had heard Mr. Butler say that only the bondholders would have an interest in the property, and if the stockholders did not buy the bonds they would have to take their chances, whereupon the witness told Mr. Butler that he would not stand by the proposed mortgage bond issue. Butler, he said, called for his resignation at the next meeting of the Board of Directors.

Much of the morning session was taken up by Julien T. Davies, of counsel for the complainants, in offering as evidence extracts of the minutes of the Directors of the company. The case was adjourned until next Wednesday.

PRIVATE TROLLEY CAR IN WRECK.

Brake Refused to Work and Two Occupants Are Injured.

CANTON, Ohio, Dec. 11.—Henry T. Everett's private trolley car with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Currie and Dr. and Mrs. O. M. Lyon, all of Akron, as passengers, was wrecked in this city this afternoon.

Dr. Lyon was probably fatally hurt, while Mrs. Lyon received injuries that may prove serious.

The car was coming toward the city at a lively rate, and the motorman applied air some distance before the switch with the Akron line was reached, but the wheels slipped on the rails, and the front trucks left the track and struck a telephone pole, knocking it down and battering in the end of the car.

Mr. Currie is General Manager of the Northern Ohio Traction Company, and was coming to the city on a pleasure trip.

THIEVES GIVE UP PLUNDER

Securities Stolen from Baltimore Bank Messenger Returned.

Found Under Porch of Uninhabited House as Anonymous Letter to Robert Pinkerton Said They Would Be.

An anonymous letter received at the office of the Pinkerton National Detective Agency in this city on Thursday brought to a successful end what threatened to be a long hunt for $7,000 worth of securities which were stolen from the Merchants' National Bank in Baltimore a week ago.

The letter bore a Baltimore postmark and was scrawled in lead pencil in a disguised hand on a piece of ordinary letter paper, the envelope being addressed to Mr. Pinkerton personally. It read as follows:

"We made a mistake when we took that bundle from the bank messenger. We did not know that we were running up against the American Bankers' Association. Now we want to make it all right and we are going to 'plant' the 'stuff' where you can get it. As soon as we have found a good place you will know."

Upon the receipt of this letter Mr. Pinkerton conferred with Superintendent Thornhill of the agency in this city and then learned that for a week his men had been endeavoring to trace the men who on the previous Friday made off with a satchel containing the $7,000 in certified checks, drafts, and coupons, which was in the custody of Stewart Hill, a messenger from the Baltimore bank, while the latter was receipting for registered mail in the Post Office.

As a sequel to the letter a telephone message was received at the agency on Thursday afternoon. In this message the promised information was furnished with a great deal of detail. Mr. Pinkerton lost no time in calling up Douglas H. Thomas, President of the Merchants' National Bank in Baltimore on the long-distance telephone. Having explained who he was, he said:

"Take the car leaving the Union Station with the words 'St. Paul' on it. Don't get off until you reach the end of the line at York Road. Cross York Road to Republic Street and continue on that street until you reach Jefferson. The third house from Republic Street on Jefferson is No. 807, and has a 'To Let' sign on it. The first step leading to the porch has a hole on the side. Reach in an arm's length and you will find the securities there."

Yesterday the Pinkerton people received word that the instructions had been followed to the letter and the result had been entirely successful. The only thing that was not in accordance with the directions was that the house bore the number 800 instead of 807.

Mr. Thomas, upon receiving the Pinkerton message, went at once to the house designated, accompanied by some local detectives and a couple of employes of the bank. Between the last step of the snow-covered stoop and the ground they found an aperture about three inches wide. Mr. Thomas put his hand into this and drew out a package wrapped in oil silk. Inside was found every dollar of the money that had been so mysteriously stolen and recovered.

Robert Pinkerton, when seen yesterday, said he had not the slightest idea as to who his mysterious informant was.

"The American Bankers' Association," he said, "was organized for the vindictive prosecution of burglars and thieves that select their victim from among its members, and the act of the robbers was prompted by the almost certain arrest and merciless prosecution that they knew would follow their act. The return of the securities was voluntary on their part and no pledge was exacted or given."

"Do you know who committed the robbery?" Mr. Pinkerton was asked.

"It is our policy never to announce for publication what we know or do not know where our clients' interests are concerned," was the reply.

"Will you attempt to effect the arrest and punishment of the thieves in view of what has happened?"

"Well really," Mr. Pinkerton replied, "as to that I must leave you to draw your own conclusions."

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 11.—The recovery by the Merchants' National Bank officials of the $7,000 securities stolen from the bank runner and efforts made to prevent the prosecution of "Doc" Bliss, who is charged with complicity in the robbery, and the hunt for J. F. Pearson, a companion of Bliss, will probably result in a serious difference between the Pinkerton Agency and the Baltimore City detectives and the United States Secret Service men.

Inspector Bearce, chief of the Philadelphia division of the Pinkerton Agency, had a long conference with Chief Pumphrey of the local detective force this afternoon. When he left, Chief Pumphrey said:

"I told him I didn't care whether the securities were recovered or not; it wasn't going to stop us from prosecuting Bliss and getting Pearson, if we could. I knew that those securities would be returned, but it won't make the case any easier for Bliss. The Baltimore police and the United States officials don't intend to be played with in this affair.

"If these men escape, it will only be encouragement for other crooks to do their work, and, if they are caught, have matters made easy for them by returning the goods. Bliss and Pearson will find any deals they may make won't stop the Baltimore Detective Department, the United States officers, and the Merchants' Bank management from prosecuting vigorously."

DIED IN HIS 102D YEAR.

Isaac Price, Old Greenpoint Resident, Succumbs to Apoplexy—Attributed Long Life to Tobacco Chewing.

Isaac Price, who was thought to be the oldest citizen of the Greenpoint section of Brooklyn, died yesterday, in his one hundred and second year, at his home, 99 Norman Avenue. He was born in the old City of New York, and when he was quite young his parents moved to Brooklyn, where Mr. Price was afterward apprenticed to a carpenter.

When Mr. Price started in business for himself he moved to Greenpoint, at a time when the shipbuilding industry was at its height. He helped in the construction of many clipper ships which were launched from there.

Mr. Price never tasted liquor in his life, but he was an inveterate chewer of tobacco, and to its use during his whole life he attributed the excellent condition of his health. At the age of 100 Years there was a family celebration, and last March, when he celebrated his one hundred and first birthday, the official board of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he had been a member for many years, honored him with the gift of a massive bouquet of 101 American Beauty roses.

A week ago Mr. Price was stricken with apoplexy while conversing with one of his great-grandchildren. A doctor who was summoned pronounced his condition hopeless. When he died yesterday morning he was surrounded by his two daughters, fourteen grandchildren, and eight great-grandchildren.

DIVORCE FOR SECRET MARRIAGE

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Dec. 11.—On the grounds of gross neglect and cruelty Mrs. Gloria Marie Calcutt, daughter of W. J. White, the wealthy chewing gum manufacturer, was granted a divorce from her husband, James F. Calcutt, a society man of Toronto, Ontario.

The only witnesses were the plaintiff, her sister, Miss Pearl White, and R. Snedden, Superintendent of the American Chicle Company.

Mrs. Calcutt said that her husband had contributed nothing toward her support since April 1, 1901. After removing to Toronto she said that he had twice pawned her jewelry, and that she had to redeem it.

The case had been advanced for hearing, as she wished to go to New York with her mother, Mrs. W. J. White. They will reside there. She was given the custody of three children.

She was secretly married to Calcutt Sept. 13, 1895, at Painesville.

MAY DISRUPT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Report That Musical Union Will Order Members to Withdraw.

Musical people in and about the Metropolitan Opera House last night were busy discussing the report that the Musical Mutual Protective Union is to order twenty or more of its members who are now with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to leave that body. If this is true it will mean either a great blow to the orchestra, in case the men decide to drop out, or else it will mean a great blow to the union in case the men disobey the command and remain with the Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Gericke of the orchestra said last night that he did not know whether any of his men belonged to the New York union, though he admitted that several musicians from this city joined his body not very long ago.

The report of the possible breaking up of such an unusual musical organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, even although it was not absolutely verified, was enough to make men in the lobby of the Metropolitan Opera House last night forget for the moment all about "La Tosca" being performed inside and give themselves up to guesses about whether or not the union would make a trial of strength with the famous orchestra.

Heretofore the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been untroubled by the usual protests of union men against those outside their organization, though other musical organizations, such as the one led by Victor Herbert in Pittsburg and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, have had to knuckle to the unions whenever the latter made demands.

The cause of the Boston organization's freedom from trouble in this direction is the attitude of Henry H. Higginson, the Boston banker, who owns and manages the orchestra. He has said over and over again that if any musical union tried to interfere with him he would simply give up the orchestra and let it disband.

As the person who has provided the money for its support and overseen its tours, his attitude for years has been "with a union, out goes the orchestra." This explains what has for a long time seemed strange to many people—the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had no trouble with unions while other musical organizations have had so much.

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a concert in Carnegie Hall to an enormous crowd night before last, there are between twenty and twenty-five members of the Musical Mutual Protective Union of New York. Of course, they are playing all the time with men who do not belong to the New York union, which is against the rules of the latter.

Walter Damrosch, as he walked into the Metropolitan last night, said that he thought it was time for the Boston organization to be having a contest with the union, as it had escaped heretofore in some unaccountable manner, while every other orchestra, like those in Pittsburg and Philadelphia, had had to be in a measure dependent on the whims of local unions.

None of the officers of the Musical Mutual Protective Union could be found at the headquarters of that body last night.

E. T. GERRY SPEEDING WEST.

OMAHA, Neb., Dec. 11.—Elbridge T. Gerry of New York, with members of his family, arrived here this morning in his special car. A special Union Pacific train was made up for him here and pulled out immediately for the west.

Mr. Gerry is on his way to Portland, Oregon, in response to a telegram informing him that his brother, P. Gerry, is very ill there. The sick man went out West with the Harriman party to be present at the opening of the Ogden Lucien cut-off, and since then has been traveling through the West with the party.

When he arrived at Portland he fell ill and was compelled to take to his bed. His brother in New York was immediately telegraphed for, and now is speeding across the country to attend at his bedside. The train on which he is traveling will make a very fast run to the coast. W. A. Dull, Superintendent of the Nebraska Division of the Union Pacific, went West with Mr. Gerry and his family.

ATTY. GEN. CROW VERY ILL.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Dec. 11.—Attorney General E. C. Crow is seriously ill. He was not well when he started from New York after arguing for the State in the Ziegler case. He arrived here yesterday from Jefferson City on private business and became ill at the Southern Hotel. His condition to-day was so much worse that the physicians thought best to remove him from the hotel. He was taken to the home of A. C. Stusver, a close personal and political friend, and the services of a trained nurse were engaged. His condition late to-night is reported as dangerous.

J. L. BLAIR LEAVES ST. LOUIS.

Starts for Florida Seeking Health in Change of Climate.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Dec. 11.—Mr. and Mrs. James L. Blair started last night for Eustis, Fla., in the hope that the change of climate will hasten Mr. Blair's recovery.

Their departure was not made known until late to-night. Accompanying them was Dr. Kimball of the Mullanphy Hospital staff, who has been in almost constant attendance upon Mr. Blair since his admission to that institution. Mr. Blair is still obliged to use a crutch in walking, and gains strength very slowly.

It is expected that he will remain in Florida for several weeks, at least until it is necessary for him to appear in court to answer the charge of forgery brought against him by the Grand Jury.

LEADER MASON WILL BE BRUCE'S SUCCESSOR

That Was the Assurance Following Conference with Odell.

IN SESSION UNTIL LATE

Following a conference between Gov. Odell and Senator Elsberg, Edward Lauterbach, and Abraham Gruber at the Fifth Avenue Hotel last night, which did not come to an end until within a few minutes of midnight, it was learned that Alexander T. Mason, leader of the Twenty-ninth District, of which Senator Elsberg and Mr. Lauterbach are residents, is almost as good as selected for the Presidency of the Republican County Committee, which office will be vacated by M. Linn Bruce Thursday of next week.

The conference did not begin until a long time after other political leaders had finished talks with the Executive. Senator Elsberg and Mr. Lauterbach kept their presence in the hotel secret. Mr. Gruber arrived late from the opera. No secret was made of his arrival.

It is the expectation that before Gov. Odell goes to attend the Pennsylvania Society dinner to-night at the Waldorf-Astoria his choice to succeed Chairman Bruce will be known. And it is also confidently expected that his plans with relation to the Treasurership to be given up by G. R. Sheldon and his views in connection with the Executive Committee Chairmanship and the other offices in the County Committee will be divulged.

Senator Platt is expected to arrive in the city to-day. Gov. Odell declared last night that he did not expect to meet him.

Chairman of the State Committee George W. Dunn is also expected to come to the city. Nothing new developed yesterday with relation to his position. Denials that ex-Congressman William L. Ward of Westchester will eventually succeed Chairman Dunn were not in evidence yesterday, and have not been at any time since Ward's name was put forward. The topic of a successor to National Committeeman Sheldon seemed to be lost sight of in the interest felt over the county Chairmanship, the Deputy Excise Commissionership, and the plans of the Governor for the reorganization of the party in the city.

Gov. Odell came to the city yesterday afternoon and took lunch at the Union League Club, going there from the Grand Central Station. He went from the club to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and there he remained until nearly midnight, when, in company with Secretary James G. Graham, he started ostensibly for the Republican Club.

All day long and up to 9:30 o'clock he conferred with politicians both in the lobby, the State Committee rooms, and his own apartment.

Louis F. Payn of Chatham was the first to get his ear. The ex-Marshal talked long and earnestly to the Governor in the State Committee rooms, but what he said neither would divulge. Mr. Payn later declared the nomination of President Roosevelt as doubtful, but said that if Mr. Roosevelt should be nominated the State of New York would go Democratic by 100,000 plurality.

Judge Brenner of Brooklyn had a long conference with the Governor. Then Edward H. Healey of the Thirty-fifth District followed him. It is pretty generally asserted that Mr. Healey will succeed George Hilliard as head of the New York County Excise Department. At one time and another during the day and early evening Gov. Odell was seen by these district leaders:

Michael Hines of the Second, Joseph Levinson of the Seventh, Charles H. Murray of the Eighth, William Halpin of the Ninth, John P. Windolph of the Eleventh, Jacob A. Newstead of the Twelfth, Samuel Strasbourger of the Thirty-first, also Leader-elect Parsons of the Twenty-fifth; Leader-elect E. H. Lehman of the Sixteenth, P. Norton Goddard, George R. Manchester, Secretary of the Republican County Committee, Superintendent of Public Works Charles S. Boyd, Jacob Snell, Superintendent of Napanoch Reformatory; Congressman William H. Flack of the Twenty-sixth Congressional District, Justice M. H. Hirschberg, recently appointed Presiding Justice of the Appellate Division in the Second Department, and Judge Aspinall of Kings County.

Each and every member of the County Committee had opportunity to voice his preferences for the Presidency of the committee. Up to 9 o'clock it was the general impression that the subject was as far from decision as ever. The Governor openly so declared it.

When asked in the afternoon in relation to the office, he said: "Why I don't pick out the Chairman of the County Committee. That is done by the members of the committee themselves."

Those members of the committee who saw the Governor yesterday were given to understand that he desired them to confer with him again about 3 o'clock to-day.

The Governor had nothing to say with reference to the report that he intended to deprive W. H. Ten Eyck, leader of the Thirty-fourth, and John P. Windolph, leader of the Eleventh, of their positions as Aqueduct Commissioners. Both are believed to be supporters of Senator Platt.

When it was hinted that the Governor might recommend legislation with the idea of having the two Commissioners ousted from their no-limit tenure, it was stated positively that he would make no reference whatever to the offices in his annual message.

WOODRUFF TALKS HARMONY

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Dec. 11.—Ex-Lieut. Gov. Timothy L. Woodruff talked about Republican politics in the State to-night, saying that he knew of nothing except harmony, explaining why Jacob Brenner was chosen Chairman of the committee in Kings and stating that Senator Elsberg would not be made Chairman of the New York County Committee.

"I haven't seen either Senator Platt or Gov. Odell since ten days before their conference with President Roosevelt," he remarked, "and I don't talk perhaps with the authority that I might if I had seen them recently, but I understand that they are in perfect agreement. Mr. Platt is to be the Republican leader and Mr. Odell is to do the work. It is understood that Mr. Odell is to reorganize the County Committee in New York County.

"The Governor would hardly think of making Nathaniel Elsberg or Alexander T. Mason President of the New York County Committee. He is working in the interest of harmony.

"As regards the situation in Kings County, it is all perfectly harmonious down there. We decided to make Jacob Brenner Chairman of the committee. Then Gov. Odell asked me to come and see him at Albany. I couldn't go, and he sent for a number of the district leaders. On Tuesday afternoon the Brooklyn newspapers announced that I was down and out, and that the meeting scheduled for that evening would be postponed in order that some one else than Mr. Brenner should be made Chairman.

"Governor Odell talked with the district leaders about some one else than Mr. Brenner, all perfectly friendly. It occurred to me that it wouldn't be advisable to change our plans. I thought that Mr. Brenner would make a very excellent Chairman, and there was no real need of postponing the meeting. So it was held as scheduled, and it took us two minutes to elect Mr. Brenner, by unanimous vote. There was not a word said about adjournment, and everything passed over very harmoniously. You see, the Governor talked about some other man, and the Brooklyn papers didn't get the situation exactly right. I am going to see Gov. Odell in New York on Sunday, and we'll talk the situation over."

COCKRAN FOR CONGRESS.

Decision Reached That Democrats Will Name Him to Succeed McClellan.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—W. Bourke Cockran has been chosen as the Democratic candidate to succeed George B. McClellan in the House of Representatives when the Mayor-elect resigns.

If Mr. Cockran could take his seat as soon as McClellan resigns, there is little doubt that the awkward complication over McClellan's place on the Ways and Means Committee could be satisfactorily solved and that Mr. Cockran would be appointed.

It is not usual to hold a vacancy on so important a committee open for a month, and it would take that long to elect Mr. Cockran to Congress. There is reason, however, to believe that this plan is under consideration.

Col. McClellan, who originally intended to resign to take effect Dec. 31, has within the last day or two been thinking of having his resignation take effect on the day he sends it in, which will be when Congress adjourns for the holiday recess.

This, it is understood, is in Mr. Cockran's interest. It would permit the holding of the election comparatively early in January and would thus lessen the Speaker's objection to having a vacancy on the committee for a considerable part of the time that Congress was actually in session. If the Speaker agrees to the proposition Col. McClellan will undoubtedly resign very soon from Congress and Mr. Cockran will be assured of a place on the Ways and Means Committee.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Dec. 11.—Henry J. Coggeshall of Waterville, Oneida County, who represented his district in the Senate 1884-1900, was a caller on Gov. Odell on Wednesday.

Mr. Coggeshall's district—the Thirty-fourth—is now represented by William Townsend, a Democrat, though it is a Republican stronghold.

Since Mr. Coggeshall's departure it has been learned that his conference with the Governor was with reference to getting the district back into the Republican column next Fall.

Upon reaching Utica on his way home Mr. Coggeshall declared his determination to enter the race for State Senator next Fall. Garry A. Willard, who defeated Mr. Coggeshall in the convention in 1900, having failed to be returned, is out of the running.

Mr. Coggeshall was elected as an independent the last time, but promises to get the regular Republican nomination next year.

"I am in the field to remain to the finish, and I shall not withdraw as I did in 1902," he declared. "I have had advices from every ward and town in the district, and I feel confident there is and will be a well-defined sentiment among Republicans in my favor."

Gov. Odell feels that with Mr. Coggeshall his party in Oneida County will be able to get back into line again.

FIRE ON ELEVATED TRAIN.

Flames in a Car Throw Bay Ridge Passengers Into a Panic.

The Bay Ridge train which left the bridge shortly before 5 o'clock last night got as far as the St. Mark's Avenue Station, on the Fifth Avenue elevated road, when some of the women passengers saw smoke issuing from the flooring of the motor car. When the guard went to make an investigation a sheet of flame shot from beneath the car seats. Much excitement followed. The women begged the trainmen to stop the train, and when no heed was paid to their entreaties, several of them became hysterical. The flames spread rapidly, and it became necessary to huddle the women together in another car.

At the Union Street Station the train was stopped, and the passengers rushed pell-mell to the platform. Before the firemen reached the scene the train crew had succeeded in extinguishing the fire.

The fire was caused by an electric wire which had lost its insulation.

WILL LIGHT NEW YORK SUBWAY

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURG, Dec. 11.—George Westinghouse has secured for the Westinghouse Machine Company the exclusive right to manufacture the Parsons steam turbine in Canada and the United States.

Mr. Westinghouse said:

"There are a half million horse power in use, and 84,000 of this is in use on steam vessels. There are 60,000 horse power stationary engines in use in the United States, and orders have been placed for 150,000 horse power more.

"The subway in New York will be lighted by electricity generated from the Parsons steam turbine engine. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company will operate its electric line in the tunnels under New York with the same engines. The Hartford City Electric Light Company is having the largest engine in the world built for it.

"The turbine need not be called the engine of the future. It is the engine of the present."

NO TURKEYS FOR EMPLOYES.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Dec. 11.—Standard Oil employes in Cincinnati have been notified of the discontinuance of the custom started by Alexander McDonald, now living at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, a number of years ago, of giving every one a turkey and oysters or a two-dollar-and-a-half gold piece at Christmas.

The Board of Directors in the East, it is stated, decided that the custom either ought to be observed at all places or discontinued in Cincinnati and determined on the latter course to avoid expense.

The high price of turkeys has, it is thought, influenced the Standard Oil Directors.

COLOMBIANS TURN BACK

COLON, Dec. 11.—The mystery surrounding the movements of Colombian troops which were reported to have landed at the mouth of the Atrato River, with a view to an attack on Panama, was cleared up to-day after the arrival of the French steamship Fournel from Savanilla and Cartagena. She was the first vessel to reach this port since the decree closing these ports to and from Colon was canceled. Gov. Melendez gave out the following interview:

"I have just learned unofficially, through passengers of the Fournel, that the Colombian warships General Pinzon and Cartagena left Cartagena at the beginning of December, having on board the same 400 troops which Gen. Tovar brought to Colon. These were landed at the Rio Atrato, with instructions to build a road toward Panama. But after terrible suffering for four days in their efforts to go up the river in small boats and canoes, and being in want of provisions of all kinds, their supplies having been soaked with water and completely spoiled, the troops resolved not to go any further. The passengers also affirm the troops have since returned to Cartagena."

News has been received here from the interior to the effect that 4,000 Colombian troops left Bogota a fortnight ago to go down the Magdalena River, but on reaching Honda, they received orders countermanding the movement, and returned to Bogota Dec. 2. It is believed that Gen. Reyes is responsible for the countermanding of the march.

Gen. Melendez further said that he had sent Commissioners to the chiefs in the Indian territory requesting them to come to Colon and interview the officials of the Government on important matters concerning their interests. One chief from the Indian settlement at Point Diablo has already accepted this invitation and arrived here. He gives assurance that Colombian troops have not been seen in his territory, and further that they would not be allowed to cross the country. Other chiefs from San Blas and Cape Mosquito, who have accepted the Government's invitation, are expected to arrive here shortly.

Copies of the following decree, signed by Gov. Insignares, dated Cartagena, Dec. 2, arrived on the Fournel:

"By virtue of instructions received by way of Port Limon from his Excellency the Commander in Chief of the Army of the Atlantic and the Pacific, it has been resolved to give preference to diplomatic methods in dealing with the Government of the United States in regard to the efforts made to defend our sovereignty and national integrity, diminished by the secession of Panama. Therefore, the causes which determined this Government to adopt measures to prevent communication with the rebel department having ceased, it is now proposed that all citizens may travel freely, without the obligation of obtaining passports, and it becomes incumbent on the civil and military authorities to give all the necessary guarantees to those entitled to the same. Consequently, it is decreed that Article II. of Decree No. 48, of Nov. 18, prohibiting all communication and commerce between this department and Panama is temporarily suspended."

The Spanish steamer Buenos Aires has arrived here from Port Limon, with a number of Colombians on board, bound for Savanilla. The Panama Government officials here placed a squad of soldiers on guard at the dock to prevent the Colombians' egress from the ship. Among the Colombians were many persons recently expelled from Colon.

The resolution was laid over for a day.

Report Says That Rear Admiral Evans With Five Ships Is Bound Thither.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Dec. 11.—A naval officer here says that the ultimate destination of the Asiatic fleet, commanded by Rear Admiral Evans, is not Honolulu, as recently announced, but Panama, where it is the Government's intention to make a big demonstration for the benefit of Colombia and the neighboring republics. The fleet consists of the battleships Kentucky, Wisconsin, and Oregon, and two smaller warships.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The Mayflower, which left in a southeastward direction yesterday, will join the Atlanta and both vessels will proceed to the Gulf of Darien for the purpose of obtaining definite information as to what is happening there. CENSURED BOARD AND CLERKS.

Nassau Grand Jury Finding Criticised by Congressman Scudder.

MINEOLA, L. I., Dec. 11.—The Nassau County Grand Jury, after a long investigation directed by Justice Maddox, yesterday returned a presentment censuring the former and present Boards of Supervisors of the county and the two Clerks for not properly keeping the books and records of the county. The presentment was rather severe, and claimed the officials had failed in their proper duty.

Congressman Townsend Scudder considered the possibility of the return of the presentment sufficient in importance to bring him on from Washington, and was considerably worked up over the way it was made. He asked who wrote it in a manner that plainly intimated that the presentment had been prepared by some one outside of the Grand Jury room. He announced his intention, too, of having a talk with James Willets, the foreman of the Grand Jury. Representative Scudder's comment was:

"I would like to know whether that presentment was prepared and handed to the Grand Jury, and I intend to have a talk with Mr. Willets at the first opportunity."

Mr. Scudder is the Democratic leader in the county, and two, a majority, of the board are his followers. He claims that much of this presentment kicked up in the county had had its base in politics, and that the investigation was brought about for political reasons.

REFUSED TO RESPITE ENNIS.

Gov. Odell Decides Not to Interfere in Brooklyn Policeman's Case—Respite for Tobin.

Judge Joseph Aspinall paid a visit to Gov. Odell yesterday at the Fifth Avenue Hotel and laid before him the legal papers connected with the prosecution and conviction of ex-Policeman William Ennis of Brooklyn, who is in Sing Sing under sentence of death for the murder of his wife. The Judge submitted the papers without recommendations. A petition that the sentence of Ennis be commuted to life imprisonment was submitted on behalf of the convicted man's mother and sister.

The Governor took the papers and announced he would make known his decision on the appeal for executive clemency this morning, but late last night he sent the information through Secretary Graham that he would not interfere with the execution of Ennis, which, therefore, will take place Monday.

An application for a respite in the case of Thomas Tobin, convicted of the murder of Capt. Croft in the Empire resort, on West Twenty-ninth Street, in September, 1902, was granted, the Governor ordering that execution of sentence be deferred thirty days in order that the examination into the convict's mental condition can be carried out to the extent desired by the commission now having that work in charge.

JERSEY JUSTICES ARRAIGNED.

Five Held in Paterson for Extortion—One Pleads Guilty.

PATERSON, N. J., Dec. 11.—Five Justices of the Peace were arraigned this morning before Judge Scott in Special Sessions Court to answer to charges of extortion, for which they were recently indicted by the Grand Jury. It is alleged that the men illegally charged 40 cents to every person who came to them to have a bail bond issued.

The men arraigned were William Snyder, Samuel Persul, Edward Cohen, all of Paterson; Philip Richmond of Passaic, and Charles J. Sinn of Clifton. Snyder pleaded guilty to the indictment, but the others pleaded not guilty, and they were all released on their own recognizance. A test suit will be made in the case of Snyder.

WORKERS TO VOTE ON WAGES.

Lodges of Amalgamated Iron Men to Decide Reduction Proposition.

PITTSBURG, Dec. 11.—The special convention of the Sheet Steel Workers of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, to consider the propositions of the manufacturers to remove the restrictive clause as to output of the mills, and that the men accept a reduction of wages, adjourned to-night after having practically acceded to the removal of the limit of output, and deciding to put the question of wage reduction to a referendum vote of the lodges.

The manufacturers say the wage reduction is as necessary as the removal of the limit of output if the union mills are to compete with the non-union.

WINDOW GLASS SELLING AGENCY.

Committee to Effect Organization of Manufacturers Under Conditions.

PITTSBURG, Dec. 11.—The window glass manufacturers, in session here for two days, adjourned this evening after giving a committee power to press the proposed selling agency until the end of this month.

If the committee succeeds in getting enough "pots" into the agreement by that time to make up a total of 1,500, it is to go ahead with the organization of the manufacturers' window glass company and call a general meeting for New Year's Day in New York City.

The agreement has been signed by companies representing 1,300 "pots," leaving but 200 more to secure.

Fall River Cloth Market Stronger.

FALL RIVER, Mass., Dec. 11.—The sales in the print cloth market for the week are estimated at from 200,000 to 250,000 pieces. The market for both regulars and odd goods has strengthened during the week, regulars advancing from 3¼ to 3⅜, and wide and narrow odds rising ⅛. Inquiries from buyers are becoming more numerous each day, and further advances of prices are expected. Talk of curtailment and the high cotton market were responsible for the upward tendency of the market.

DEMOCRATS ACQUIESCE IN PANAMA CONDITIONS

But Severely Condemn the Administration's Action.

STATEMENT BY HOUSE LEADER

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The Democratic policy on the subject of the Panama Republic and the canal, so far as the House is concerned, was officially announced to-day by the Democratic leader, Mr. Williams. It is that the Democrats regard the establishment of the republic as a fact accomplished; that they desire the construction of the canal, and therefore acquiesce in the situation, but that they regard the means by which the canal was secured as disgraceful to the American Government.

This announcement was drawn forth by a speech from Chairman Hitt of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. Dinsmore of Arkansas, a Democrat, began the debate by a speech denouncing the President's policy. He said the Republic of Panama had been established and that it existed by the power of the United States, and that without that power it could not exist. Nothing had been gained that could not have been gained in a straightforward and honorable way.

He did not use the word "honorable" in an offensive sense, but insisted that but for the action of the United States there would be no Republic of Panama.

Mr. Dinsmore, referring to the provisions of the Panama Canal bill, said:

"Here is the law. Did the President obey it? Everybody knows that he made no pretense of obeying the law. Has any excuse been offered why he did not obey it?

"He has not even vouchsafed to Congress, whose law he has violated, the slightest excuse. Is he above the law? Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if this is true, we have come upon evil times when the executive power of government can usurp authority and cast aside the express wish of Congress declared by law."

MR. HITT'S SPEECH.

Mr. Hitt, (Rep., Ill.,) replying to Mr. Dinsmore, said he was astonished at the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas. Such attacks on the Government would not be made by any foreigner in discussing its action.

Mr. Dinsmore disavowed any purpose to impute dishonorable or improper motives to the officers of the Government.

Mr. Hitt said there was nothing hasty or unique in the recognition of the new republic, as it took place five days after the promulgation of the independence of the republic.

Mr. Williams (Miss.) asked if this was not the first time in South American history "that the other fellow has been prevented from shooting back."

Mr. Hitt made a vigorous defense of the Administration. The President, he said, had not been precipitate, but had waited a reasonable time. "But," he added, "he did not waste time—he never does."

"Ordinarily," Mr. Hitt went on, "when a ship is in port and a disturbance or insurrection occurs, we land troops to protect Americans from being killed or robbed. We have done that in France, and we would do it anywhere."

Mr. Hitt referred to the "solemn and binding engagement" on the part of the United States to keep the path across the Isthmus open. Always heretofore, he said, American interference had inured to the benefit of Colombia. In this last case it brought a consequence that was grave to her. Mr. Hitt added:

"It was done sedulously and carefully, but it did result in making it very difficult for troops to come from Bogota. Our Government will not permit anybody on the line of that railway or the crossing of the Isthmus who would disturb free transit, and it is because the two things coincide that men who do not look on the matter calmly and fairly will say that we did what we did to injure Bogota, when, in fact, we did it to keep good faith, though it did injure Bogota."

After reviewing the history of the act of Congress, the negotiations with Colombia, and the sending of the treaty to Bogota, Mr. Hitt said the people of Colombia thought the United States was so bent on having a canal on the Isthmus that the game was easy. They had $10,000,000, but $20,000,000 would be better, and Colombian papers had urged the holding out for great sums of Yankee money. Referring to the rise of Panama, Mr. Hitt said: "It is not a matter of space. The rule of square of mile is a mistake. Moral laws are not measured from the surveyor's point."

Mr. Hitt: "The one purpose has been effected, the one that has been voted for in this body, and has governed the action of our Government, and the one that every good American heartily sympathizes with.

"That is the reason we do not apologize for the conduct of our Government in following the precedents of its past history, and we are proud that we have a President who does not wait ten years."

The whole world, Mr. Hitt said, had been in favor of a canal, adding: "We have got a man to work on it who will soon cut it through." This was loudly cheered by the Republicans.

Mr. Williams, interrupting, said he wanted to take the burden of saying "yes" to the question as to whether the Government had been virtually guilty of moral obliquity in its international relations in its action concerning the Republic of Panama.

Mr. Hitt, continuing, said the people of Panama had organized a Government which had the cordial support of every one who lived there.

Replying to Mr. Dinsmore, he said:

"The President of the United States had no representatives there, (on the Isthmus,) except two very low-salaried Consular officers and one clerk, and he had no money except what has been appropriated by this body." Continuing, Mr. Hitt said:

"Following the spirit of the treaty and of the legislation since, the President, while waiting a reasonable time, found that the will of Congress should be carried out, and he would not submit to the blackmail that was tried to be imposed upon the people of the United States owing to the rapacity of a band of men who abused their authority. It is not in the spirit of our people. When the open hand of bounty is met by the clinched fist of malice and greed the Yankee knows how to stop that business."

Mr. Hitt held that the "amenities of life" should prevent attacks on the President.

THE DEMOCRATS' POSITION.

Mr. Williams had not intended to speak, but Mr. Hitt's address led him to believe that the time had come for setting the Democratic Party straight before the country, and he therefore announced its attitude.

"The gentleman's appeal to the amenities of life," he said, "strikes me, as it strikes everybody else, very powerfully; but this is not Russia. There is no such thing as lèse majesté here when we criticise a public officer, whether he is the President of the United States or a Justice of the Peace.

"This is the first time in the history of the United States that we have interfered with the internecine affairs of a Central or South American State. The gentleman has virtually admitted that we have notified the Republic of Colombia that if she dares land a soldier on the territory of Panama we will treat it as an act of war.

"That confession involves a confession of the fact that we have for the first time taken the step of interfering in the domestic broils of Central and South America.

"I once served on the Foreign Affairs Committee. We get mysterious when we get over there. I became quite an expert on diplomacy, but I never became such an expert as the gentleman from Illinois. I never got so that I could surround or walk through a face.

"The idea that we should go through the world saying 'this is my administration, my Government, and therefore (all that it does is right,' that idea is tyranny, that idea is despotism, that idea is the stopping place of all analysis and criticism of the deeds of public officers. You might as well say that the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. Hepburn) is guilty of violating the Ten Commandments or like unto them when he says my bill on the tariff are absurd.

"The Democracy wants a trans-Isthmian canal. It wanted it at Nicaragua. The House of Representatives wanted it at Nicaragua. Under the able leadership of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] we passed the best canal bill that has been passed yet.

"But if we can't get it where it ought to be, we will take it somewhere else, and if we can't get it as it should be given to us, we will take it as it shall be given to us.

"If the President positively refuses to obey the plain intent and words of the Spooner act, approved by him and perhaps suggested by him; if he is going to override the law, then, for God's sake, hurry up your canal. Let us have it somewhere, because even at Panama it will benefit American commerce and industry and add strength to the American Navy for purposes of self-defense.

"We do not condone the action of our Government in connection with the affairs of the Isthmus. We do not excuse it. An accomplished fact must be dealt with as an accomplished fact, but we want it distinctly understood that we are not proud of the part our country has taken.

"But we are not idiots either, and when it comes to recognizing an accomplished fact, a man ought to have sense enough to do that, whether he likes it or not, and no matter how vilely and horribly the fact was accomplished."

DECREASE IN COTTON TO CHINA.

Exports of United States, England, India, and Japan Fall Off.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The marked reduction in the exports of cotton goods from the United States to China in 1903, compared especially with 1902, has been the occasion of considerable anxiety and inquiry both on the part of manufacturers and those generally interested in the development of the foreign commerce of the United States.

A statement recently issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor shows that in the ten months ended with October, 1903, the value of all exports from the United States to China was $12,825,818, against $20,006,769 in the corresponding months of 1902, and $15,516,529 in the corresponding months of 1901.

An examination of the details of our exports to China shows that this reduction is almost exclusively in cotton goods. The total value of exports of cotton cloth to China from the United States in the ten months ended with October, 1903, was $8,516,626, against $14,633,070 in the corresponding months of 1902, and $8,565,501 in the corresponding months of 1901; while of other cotton goods our exports to China in the ten months of 1903 were $26,305, against $51,100 in the corresponding months of 1902, and $122,886 in the corresponding months of 1901.

An examination as to the cause of this reduction indicates that the falling off is due to a general reduction in the imports of cotton goods into China, rather than from any reduction in the popularity or relative share which the cotton manufactures of the United States have in the total imports into China.

While the exports of cotton goods from the United States to China do show a large falling off during this period, this is also the experience of other countries supplying China with cotton goods, notably the United Kingdom, India, and Japan, which, with the United States, are the chief countries supplying China with her importations of cotton goods.

M. P.S' VISIT TO PARIS.

Foreign Correspondence NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Dec. 1.—The visit of the British members of Parliament to Paris was considerably marred by the shocking weather which prevailed from first to last. Beginning in a storm of wind and rain, the visit continued and ended in heavy and persistent snowstorms. The pilgrimage to Versailles on the third day proved very cold and damp, and when the great fountains were set playing there was a veritable meeting of the waters.

In the magnificent Salle des Glaces a charming little interlude was arranged for the visitors. The three sisters Mantes, from the opera, in picturesque Louis XV. dresses danced a stately minuet to the strains of Boccherini's well-known music. The pretty powdered heads and the quaint Watteau frocks in the seventeenth century setting of the famous gallery, in which Louis XIV. himself was wont to lead that very same dance, made a beautiful picture.

The spectacle probably pleased those who saw it more than all the rest of the functions given in their honor, including the reception at the embassy and the visit to the Hôtel de Ville.

DIPLOMATS LEAVING BELGRADE.

Their Action May Be Due to the Non-Punishment of the Servian Regicides.

VIENNA, Dec. 11.—According to a dispatch from Belgrade, the German, Austrian, and Turkish Ministers are preparing to leave that city, ostensibly for long holidays. The Russian and Italian representatives have already left Belgrade on a similar pretext.

The real reason for the exodus of the diplomats, however, is said to be that King Peter has negatived the demands of these Ministers for the punishment of the assassins of King Alexander and Queen Draga.

Other reports say that the Turkish Minister at Belgrade protested to the Minister of Foreign Affairs against the secret preparations which are alleged to be going on in Servia for the purpose of supporting an outbreak in old Servia next Spring. To this protest the Foreign Minister gave an evasive answer, whereupon the Turkish Minister left Belgrade.

It is considered likely that the departure of the other Ministers may be based upon the alleged intention of Servia to interfere in Macedonian affairs.

RUSSIAN RAILWAY FOR CHINA.

ST. PETERSBURG, Dec. 11.—The Russo-Chinese Bank will open subscriptions on Dec. 27 in Paris and St. Petersburg for the construction of a railroad between Chengting-Foo, Province of Pe-chi-Li, and Taiyuen-Foo, capital of the Province of Shansi, to cost $20,000,000.

TEXAS-NEW MEXICO BOUNDARY.

Former, According to New Survey, Secures Some Additional Territory.

Special to The New York Times.

AUSTIN, Texas, Dec. 11.—Advices were received here to-day that United States engineers who are making a survey looking to relocating the boundary line between New Mexico and Texas have arrived at Anthony, N. M., and that they replaced the boundary monument at that place, giving Texas a strip of territory 300 feet wide off of New Mexico.

The joint boundary commission of Texas and the United States will begin the work of officially surveying the boundaries between Oklahoma and Texas and between New Mexico and Texas as soon as the necessary authority is granted by Congress.

The Texas Legislature has already authorized such action.

TREES IN UPPER BROADWAY.

Park Committee of Municipal Art Society is Doubtful as to the Possibility of Restoring Them.

Representatives of the Women's Municipal League, the Municipal Art Society, the Women's Republican Club, and the West End Association met last evening in the office of the United States Mortgage and Trust Company, at Seventy-third Street and Broadway, to discuss the question of replanting the central spaces on the old Boulevard, near Broadway.

Calvin Tompkins, President of the Municipal Art Society, presented a paper from the Park Committee of that society, in which the committee says that before next Spring practically all of the Boulevard should be ready for replanting. The question to consider, it says, is how this planting shall be done; that is, whether an attempt shall be made to restore the former elm tree rows, or whether there shall be grown close masses of large shrubs or small trees.

The committee says that if the conditions of soil, space, and care were favorable, it would be preferable to grow elms through the centre and along the sides of the Boulevard, in accordance with the original design. But, it says, these conditions are not favorable. The central space has been filled in by the subway contractors with broken stone, gravel, and sand, with a fairly good soil from six inches to a foot deep and a grass sod on top. For the most part, the soil on the avenue is totally unsuited to growing large trees. A harmonious effect throughout might be preserved in a simple manner by the planting of shrubs or trees suitable to make the work uniform, adding a lawn setting or border of well-kept green turf.

The opinion is expressed that the most beautiful and satisfactory results could be secured by planting these central places with small shrubs, except where the planting of trees is found practicable and advisable.

The committee believes that the expense of providing new soil of the best quality obtainable would be justifiable, even if the entire cost fell upon the city.

It was decided by the meeting that after Jan. 1 the plans should be taken before the Board of Estimate to see if the city would pay the required $50,000 for the replanting.

MAY BE A TAMMANY CLUBHOUSE.

LITCHFIELD, Conn., Dec. 11.—On a tract of land recently purchased by a number of New York men, it is declared a country club for Tammany Hall members is to be opened the coming Spring at South Farms, adjacent to the widely known Seven Springs of Morris.

Work on a clubhouse and outlying cottages was begun to-day. The area of the property is six hundred acres and originally on it stood the Ratio Benton Inn, a famous tavern for more than a hundred years. Of late years the land has been in litigation on the question of title.

President Fox of the Democratic Club, who was seen last night in reference to the report, said:

"This is the first time I have heard of any such plan. I can only say that if any Democrats propose to establish such a club they are acting as individuals and not as members of the Democratic Club."

TO SUCCEED JUSTICE MAYER.

Magistrate Deuel May Be Appointed, His Place Going to Charles S. Whitman.

City Hall rumors yesterday connected the name of City Magistrate Joseph M. Deuel with the prospective appointment by Mayor Low to the vacancy on the Special Sessions bench to succeed Justice Mayer, who shortly will resign. It is generally admitted that Justice Mayer will have his resignation in the hands of the Mayor before the latter goes out of office, so that Mr. Low will have the appointment of his successor to serve for the unexpired term, about nine and a half years, at $9,000 annually.

Friends of the Mayor said yesterday that the Deuel appointment is more than likely, and they also declare that Mayor Low will appoint Charles S. Whitman, Assistant Corporation Counsel, to be City Magistrate to succeed Magistrate Deuel when the latter is promoted. Whitman now is assigned to the Mayor's office as special counsel and would have eight and a half years to serve as City Magistrate, the salary being $6,000. Mr. Whitman is a Republican.

A ROOM FULL OF COLOR.

Remarkable Exhibit of Landscapes by Homer D. Martin.

The Lotos Club is holding a small exhibition of paintings by one American landscapist which rarely if ever has been surpassed by the shows held heretofore in the little "dining room gallery." Thirty paintings by the late Homer D. Martin have been borrowed from the private collections of half that number of art lovers. The club has transferred a fine specimen from its own walls and a couple of art dealers have contributed examples hitherto little known. While the score and a half of canvases do not exhaust the range of Martin's work, they present a very homogeneous array of pictures belonging to the eighties and nineties, when he was in full possession of that extraordinary faculty for poetic color work which marked him, in some respects, the greatest of our landscapists during the past century.

There are no specimens of his early style before he had broken through the bonds of the school out of which he emerged. There are none of those carefully wrought but never stupid drawings which are so interesting in the career of a colorist who was undervalued because people thought he could not draw. Nor do we find here the rare green landscapes nor the pictures he made in his very last years in the West when failing sight compelled him to follow his old routine of coloration, though, even then, with brilliant results, rather than base his picture on the mood which a landscape suggested in his mind.

Many of these canvases are known to those who visit loan collections; some of them are old favorites. Here is the "Westchester Hills," that went to the Universal at Paris in 1900 and had a better reception than it obtained in the eighties, when an attempt was made by Martin's admirers to get the Salon to hang it. Here is the "Old Bridge in Normandy," shown at the Clausen Gallery when it was bought by President Humphreys, that bold, almost rugged canvas, with strong lines in the middle distance and foreground, standing firmly against the rich hill slope and the tender sky. Here, too, is the "Old Church in Normandy," at Criqueboeuf, which comes, like "Westchester Hills," from the Untermyer collection—as reserved, cool, and pensive in color as some of the canvases here are riotous with gayety and exuberant of the love of brilliant, jocund hues. The opalescent sky forms a delightful note, pearly and cool, yet charged with color, behind the ivy-clad church, whose ancient tower, with its battering lines, is reflected in the little stream.

Among the newer pieces is a "Road to Rouen," which belongs in date and locality to the "Old Bridge in Normandy." Dependent as these are to some extent upon the associations we have with Europe, our liking for the solid constructions of stone in churches and bridges, it is interesting to note what Martin could do to interest us, without more than a trace of man's handiwork, in a landscape purely given over to the rush of the artist's feeling for beauty in bare fields and rocky knolls. Such is the "Coast Near Newport," from the Gellatly collection, dated 1880, one of those early Autumn views near Paradise, Newport, in which nothing appears but some outcropping rocks with scattering cedars, a glint of water in the marshy coast land to the left, and a procession of clouds on the horizon where one feels the ocean must be. The intense quiet of this scene, the rich but not brilliant coloration, give us another mood from that in "Westchester Hills," a kindly and genial mood. Here we have a strong under drawing which reveals itself only after long inspection.

Among the more loosely brushed canvases is one that looks at first unfinished. It is the large "Sun Worshippers," in which a file of wind-shorn trees lean one way as they struggle from left to right. The background is so broadly treated that one hesitates to say whether the horizon has above it a bank of clouds over a lake, or a low range of hills. Martin has left this big canvas as it is, because in it he has said all he wanted to say. "The Crescent Moon" is a more majesterial canvas—great cliffs to the right in shadow; behind them a white and rose sky at sunset; to the left the flats near the sea with sluggish creeks reflecting the delicate cloud-strewn sky, and through these clouds the sickle moon, still white. In this case we have again the cloudlets just above the horizon with their suggested movement which Martin knew how to paint better than any one else. Another mood is the golden lake view, "Evening," serene and mellow, as fine in its way as anything in the room. "Mill Near St. Cloud" is yet another fine big canvas suggestive of the wide horizons beloved by Michel, and in its handling of the mill the love of bold drawing we see in Raffaelli. It comes from the Evans collection.

Smaller and more reserved, but always glad with the opalescent skies he delighted in, are such pictures as "Lake Champlain," from the Schuyler collection, and the wood interiors, "Landscape" and "Symphony," lent by Mr. Malcolm MacMartin. "French Coast" and "The Sea at Villerville" are studies in the grays and pale browns of Normandy on a cloudy day, Mr. L. G. Bloomingdale's "Normandy Farm," Mr. Arthur Hearn's landscape, dated 1894; Mr. Humphreys's "Autumn on the Susquehanna," Mr. Rhoades's "Normandy Trees," are in each case an individual mood reflected by the color scheme. Very fine indeed are "Newport Neck," presented by Messrs. Evans and Hearn to the Lotos Club, and the "Adirondack View," dated 1886, lent by Mr. Untermyer. Since the exhibition at the Century Club shortly after Martin's death no such complete and well-chosen collection of his work has been seen. The Art Committee is to be congratulated.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

CHERRYFIELD, Me., Dec. 11.—The Cherryfield Hotel, Baptist Church, and a livery stable owned by Charles McGouldrick were burned to-day by a fire which originated from a stove in the hotel parlor. The loss was $25,000.

WINDSOR, Conn., Dec. 11.—A barn owned by August Pooler and containing a large quantity of tobacco was burned last night. The loss, $20,000, is half covered by insurance.

FALL RIVER, Mass., Dec. 11.—A spark from a match, with which the gas was being lighted in a window of James H. Booth's dry goods store to-night started a fire that gutted the two blocks at the corner of Pocasset and South Main Streets, caused a loss of $50,000, and nearly cost the life of Mrs. De Conesme, a tenant, who fainted in the excitement, and when discovered by the firemen her hair was ablaze. She escaped dangerous burns.

POSTUM.

ON THE BABY.

Coffee Even the Babies Thrive On.

The little daughter of a College President was saved by the use of Postum Food Coffee at a time when she could not take any solid food.

Baby's aunt says: "My sister and her husband (who is President of a College in Georgia) visited me last Christmas, and their little baby, two months old, was very sick. I thought it was not properly nourished, so I began feeding it on Postum, which I have used in my own home for years with such grand results.

"You would be surprised to know how that little thing improved. Sister had been feeding it on artificial food that did not agree with it. The baby continued to get stronger all the time we were feeding her on Postum, and when sister left here she took Postum with her, for she feels certain that with Postum to feed the baby on she is sure of good, healthy, nourishing food drink." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum is made of the purest cereals, with absolutely no medication whatever, and when boiled according to directions it is heavy with food value and a great nourisher and rebuilder, as well as a delicious drink. It is also a specific for all of the dozens of different diseases caused by coffee. Trial proves this.

CREW IN AIRY COSTUMES

Singhalese, Arabs, and Egyptians Shiver at the Battery While They Dispute with Captain About Clothes.

In the crisp December air a group comprising Singhalese, Arabs, Egyptians, Malays, one Zanzibari, and one Eurasian, stood and shivered near the Battery yesterday morning. They were the crew, thirty-seven in all, of the British steamship Nithsdale, now lying at the Arbuckle sugar docks, Brooklyn. They had started out from Colombo on Oct. 8, and have since visited other Eastern ports.

They reached these cold shores on Saturday and freely confessed themselves as mutineers—mutineers against the Captain and his officers, against this land, but most of all against this climate.

The majority of the sailors were clad in gunny sacks, tied at the waist, with paper bags for hats. Here and there some lucky member of the crew was sporting a fez, which had all the appearance of an heirloom. Few of them wore shoes, and the toes of the unshod were no longer brown, but blue. They presented so odd a spectacle that they attracted the attention even of an incoming crowd of immigrants.

After much effort to talk by signs and through a not very skillful interpreter the shivering strangers told their tale of woe. They explained their belief that the Captain had the right to rule in all matters of controversy among them, and had the right to flog them. The highest wages which any of them received, the engineer being one of the fortunate ones, they said, was $9.40 a month in United States money. They said that they had been fed mainly on buns, and four ounces of meat a day instead of four ounces each meal. But worst of all, they said, was receiving no additional clothing as they approached these shores. They confessed that now for three days they had been mutineers against the Captain, who had refused to give them better clothing.

The brown men, when they had made these explanations, went directly to the rooms of the Legal Aid Society on State Street.

When the half-dressed crew had landed on Saturday they went first to the British Consul and told him of their troubles. It was Mahomet Hassau, an Egyptian, through whom they made their speech, and who said:

"We won't work any more; we are freezing."

It was evident they had cause for complaint, and Sir Percy Sanderson wrote a letter to Capt. Haddon of the Nithsdale asking him to see that the men were properly clothed.

The Captain replied that he was not by law required to pay the crew until they reached home again, and that anyway they had spent all their money at Yokohama in riotous living.

The Consul made another appeal, and the Captain relented enough to find a clothier to whom he directed the shivering crew.

But the sailors would have none of that. They thought they detected a scheme. The Captain or somebody would make money on their clothing, and, although they were suffering, they would not stand that. They would freeze first.

That attitude did not serve to mollify the Captain. The crew then applied to the Legal Aid Society, and for that organization Franklin Grier, in charge of the Seaman's Branch, took up the case. He succeeded again in opening negotiations with the Captain, who relented once more enough to allow the crew $1 each. But $1 will not go far toward buying clothing in New York, and through the instrumentality of the Legal Aid Society and the Captain the allowance was raised to $2 for each man. So yesterday, upon the crew's second visit to the Legal Aid Society, they were taken to Baxter Street. There they were bought shoes, socks, and underwear, but that was as far as the money would go. Outwardly they look the same, and are still wearing gunny sacks and paper bags for fezzes.

BELLBOY McAULEY HELD.

Lad Who Shot Another Befriended by Lady Guests of Martha Washington Hotel.

Magistrate Cornell, in the Jefferson Market Police Court, yesterday held Henry McAuley, the elevator boy in the Martha Washington Hotel for women, on East Twenty-ninth Street, in $2,000 bail for examination on Monday. McAuley is charged with shooting William Morrissey, Captain of the bellboys in the hotel. At the New York Hospital it was stated yesterday that Morrissey's wounds are not serious.

Hugh O. Pentecost, the attorney for the accused, asked an adjournment of the hearing until Monday, which was granted. Mr. Pentecost was called on the telephone early yesterday morning and asked to take charge of the case by some of the guests of the hotel who believe that McAuley, who is only seventeen years old, though he appears older, had been driven to homicidal mania by the nagging of the other boys in the place. He was popular with the guests, but not liked by his fellows.

Miss B. Reffner and Mrs. Broadbeck, who as a committee had summoned Mr. Pentecost to act as attorney for the elevator boy, were in court.

Mr. Pentecost, in explaining the events that led up to the shooting, said yesterday: "Morrissey and McAuley had quarreled. Morrissey turned the other boys against McAuley and led him a dog's life. McAuley resigned yesterday, and after brooding over his ill-treatment, came back to the hotel, where he shot Morrissey."

PATRIA CLUB'S SCHOOL PLAN.

Prizes to be Offered Pupils for Patriotic Essays.

Members of the Patria Club met last night at the Hotel Savoy, A. Walker Otis, President of the club, presiding. George R. Bishop, Chairman of the Committee on Patriotic Work, reported a plan by which cash prizes are to be offered to the pupils in the High Schools in New York for the best essays on patriotic subjects.

Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood of Boston, Chairman of the Publication Committee of the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration, delivered the principal address of the evening. Dr. Trueblood said that of all the good things in the interest of civilization, the action of President Roosevelt in referring the case of Venezuela and her creditors to The Hague was one of the greatest. This pointed the way, he said, to the time when all disputes among the peoples shall be settled by the tribunal of The Hague.

Dr. Thomas Barclay, who was one of those who worked hardest for the arbitration treaty between Great Britain and France, told briefly how he had arranged that the members of the Chambers of Commerce in England held their convention in France, a preliminary move to the establishment of the good feeling between the two nations.

BARTENDER FOOLED SLEUTHS.

Their Excise Evidence Turned Out to be Tea and Ginger Ale.

In the Court of Special Sessions, Brooklyn, yesterday afternoon John Smith, a bartender employed by Patrick Gormley, a Borough Park saloon keeper, was accused by two detectives of the Fourth Avenue station with having sold a flask of whisky to them in prohibited hours.

From the time the arrest was made until yesterday the flask, corked and sealed, had been carefully guarded by the police. When it was produced in court yesterday Marvin F. Lynch, counsel for the defense, asked the detectives if they were positive that it contained whisky. Both replied in the affirmative, although admitting that they hadn't tested the stuff.

Smith was then called to the stand and was directed to open the bottle in the presence of the court and taste its contents. Wedging an expansive grin, he tasted the liquid.

"Is it whisky?" asked counsel.

The bottle was passed up to the bench. Justice Keady took a long whiff and then smiled. He passed it to Justice Forker, who also put his nose to the mouth of the flask, smelled, and then also smiled. Justice Courtney went through the same performance, and he chuckled.

"Case dismissed," they said in chorus.

It appeared that when the detectives visited the saloon Smith recognized them. Instead of whisky he had filled the flask with the combination beverage he had mentioned.

HAFFEN ANGERS CARPENTERS.

Union Men in Bronx Say Borough President Failed to Keep Promises.

The carpenters in the Bronx are denouncing Borough President Haffen because, they assert, he failed to keep a promise that all the carpenters employed in the borough on public work would be paid the union wages of $4.50 a day.

At a meeting of Local 464 of the Brotherhood, held yesterday in Miller's Casino, One Hundred and Fifty-fourth Street and Third Avenue, the business agents complained that Mr. Haffen not only promised before election that after Nov. 1 all the carpenters in the Bronx employed on city work would receive $4.50 a day, but that all the non-union men would have to join the union.

"Now," said one of the business agents, "what has become of the promises? There is plenty of demand for carpenters here, and the wages are $3 and $3.50 a day for municipal work and all other work. We have had no applications for non-union men to join the union."

It was decided to send a committee to Mr. Haffen and demand that the wages of $4.50 a day be paid for city work.

AMMON STOCK DEAL SUIT.

Secor & Bell Get a Verdict for Amount They Were Induced to Invest.

The jury in the Supreme Court which heard the testimony in the suit brought by Secor & Bell, brokers of Toledo, Ohio, against Alfred R. Gosiin, Robert A. Ammon, and other defendants on Thursday, yesterday returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount sued for, $6,300 with costs, which brings the total up to $7,943.25. Secor & Bell claimed that Gosiin and his agents induced them to invest in worthless stocks.

The trial of the suit of Finlay, Barrell & Co. of Chicago to recover $11,800 from the same defendants over similar transactions was finished, and a sealed verdict will be returned by the jury on Monday.

Robert A. Ammon Disbarred.

Robert A. Ammon, who was counsel for "520 per cent. Miller," and who was convicted of receiving stolen goods, for which offense he is now serving a sentence in Sing Sing, was disbarred yesterday by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court on a motion made some time ago by Egerton L. Winthrop, Jr., counsel for the Bar Association.

Prison for "Masher" Beaten by Woman.

Isaac Moses, the upholsterer, who was arrested early last week in Huber's Museum after he had been severely punished by Mrs. May Gollins, whom he had insulted, as she alleged, was sentenced to serve sixty days in the penitentiary by Presiding Justice McKean, in the Court of Special Sessions, yesterday afternoon.

Hid $4,000 in Hotel Boiler.

August Uthemeyer, twenty-nine years old, a porter in a hotel at Fort George, conducted by J. Schultheiss, was arraigned in the Harlem Police Court yesterday charged with having stolen $4,000 from his employer. The latter had made a safe deposit vault of a boiler in the hotel, in which the money had been placed in a tin box on Nov. 4. When Schultheiss went to look for the cash a few days later, box and all were gone. Uthemeyer denied the charge. Suspicion also rests on another man who worked in the hotel but sailed for Germany on Nov. 21.

Fell Into Boiling Acids.

Archibald Blair, a foreman in the Orford Copper Company's works on Constable Hook, Bayonne, yesterday afternoon fell feet first into a boiling mixture of acids, ammonia, and sal soda. That he escaped death almost instantly was due to the fact that two men were close to him, and almost as he fell they grabbed him by the hair and dragged him back out of the vat. He was taken to the Bayonne Hospital, where it is said that he cannot recover.

Seeks to Extradite Bermuda Thieves.

Extradition proceedings were commenced by the British Government yesterday before United States Commissioner Alexander to secure the removal to Bermuda of the two negroes, William Lambert and William Watkins, who were captured on the Pretoria when she arrived Thursday, having in their possession jewelry valued at $15,000, stolen from Duncan M. Roe of Hamilton, Bermuda.

Anti-Smoot Resolutions Passed.

At Jane Street Methodist Episcopal Church last evening the Rev. O. R. Miller of Washington, D. C., Field Secretary of the Reform Bureau, gave a special address on "Reform Work in Congress." He attacked Senator Smoot, and said he was not fit to hold a position as a United States Senator, and gave his reasons why. At the close of his address resolutions were unanimously passed calling upon the United States Senate to expel Smoot from that body.

To Fight Lafayette Place Trolley.

The Interurban Street Railway Company is seeking consents from the property owners on Lafayette Place for the installation of a trolley system through that street. Among others, the consent of Messrs. Brokaw Brothers has been asked. That firm has absolutely refused to grant such consent. It purposes to fight the proposition to the end, and has requested the Merchants' Association of New York to seek the co-operation of other property owners in opposition.

North River Tunnel Franchise.

Although there was no opposition shown yesterday when, at a public hearing before the Aldermanic Committee on Railroads, the franchise asked by the Manhattan and Hudson Railroad Company for tunnel rights to run under the North River from Exchange Place, Jersey City, to Cortlandt Street, Manhattan, came up for consideration, Alderman Diemer, as Chairman of the committee, later announced that the entire matter would be allowed to go over for the incoming administration.

BOSTON BOOKSELLERS FINED.

Three Leading Dealers Found Guilty of Selling Obscene Literature—Will Appeal to Higher Courts.

BOSTON, Dec. 11.—Three of the leading booksellers of this city were found guilty to-day in the Municipal Court of having sold or having had in their possession obscene literature. The complaints were made by the Watch and Ward Society. A fine of $100 was imposed in each case, the defendants being Walter H. Knight, Richard Lichtenstein and William L. Palmer.

George A. Moore, Treasurer of the historic Old Corner Book Store, who was arrested with the others, was discharged on the ground that the books seized by the Watch and Ward agents belonged to the Old Corner Book Store Corporation and not to one of its officers.

The books involved in the case, the defense contended, were classic and were to be found in public libraries and many private libraries. The case will be carried to higher courts.

The books seized were Boccaccio's "Decameron," the "Heptameron" of the Queen of Navarre, and the works of Rabelais.

HOUSE TERROR IS ROUTED

Representative Benny of Bayonne Attacks Col. Hepburn.

New Congressman Resents a Snub to Mr. Baker and Puts Iowan to Flight.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—A new member of the House, Allan Benny of Bayonne, N. J., to-day surprised that body by making an attack upon Col. Hepburn of Iowa, that terror to new members, and routing him. The rugged old Iowan likes nothing better than to toss some novice out of his way. It is not long since, being interrupted by Mr. Baker of New York, who politely sought to ask a question, the old man roared back:

"Mr. Speaker, who was that who interrupted me? Mr. Baker of New York? I refuse to my refusal to yield."

It was this incident that furnished the text of Benny's attack on Hepburn, which was keenly enjoyed by the Democrats.

"As a new member of this House," said Mr. Benny, "I have been interested in seeing how it feels to be a member of a close corporation where the Speaker owns 51 per cent. of the stock, the gentleman from New York (Mr. Payne) is the Secretary, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Dalzell) is the sergeant at Arms.

"The Democratic members of the corporation are not allowed to do anything but talk, but they are repaid by the great courtesy of the Speaker, the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Grosvenor.) These gentlemen all fairly exude courtesy.

"Then there is the gentleman from Iowa (here Mr. Benny pretended to be in doubt about the Colonel's identity, even as the veteran Congressman had affected ignorance of Baker's.

"Is he from Iowa?" asked Benny, appealing to some of his colleagues. "Oh, yes, the gentleman from Iowa. He is the big gun of the Republican Party, the Long Tom of the House. They bring him out and fire him off whenever there is special need that somebody should speak for them with authority. He is an oracle, and to interrupt him even with a question is an unpardonable offense, punishable by the penalty of insult."

Col. Hepburn gazed at the audacious novice as if he could hardly believe his ears. He listened a while restlessly. Then he got up and started for the back of the House, with the laughter of the Democrats ringing in his ears. As he did so Benny fired this after him:

"I saw a number of gentlemen on the Republican side laugh at the utterly unfair reference of the gentleman of Iowa to the gentleman from New York, who conducted himself at that time in such a manner as to win the approbation of every man"—and Benny threw tremendous emphasis on the word "man"—"in this House.

"In view of the deference paid to the gentleman, I am almost ashamed to find myself in opposition to him without that trembling sensation that ought to possess me."

By this time Hepburn had escaped, and Benny devoted the rest of his speech to an attack on Hepburn's tariff arguments.

CUBAN BILL IN THE SENATE.

Mr. Bard Opposes It and Mr. McCreary, in First Address to House, Supports Measure.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The Cuban Reciprocity bill came up for discussion in the Senate to-day, and Mr. Bard, Republican, California, who said that he stood alone on his side of the Chamber, spoke in opposition to the measure. Mr. McCreary, Democrat, Kentucky, in his first address to the Senate supported the bill, and his speech was listened to with close attention.

Mr. Bard said that he had searched in vain to discover any moral obligation on the part of the United States to do more for Cuba than already has been done. "Because we have done much for Cuba, we are under obligations to do more, brings no conviction to my mind," he added.

Mr. Bard argued that the passage of the bill would have the effect of injuring the sugar producers of the United States, and contended that our Government is under greater obligation to protect American than to promote Cuban interests. He contended that the passage of the bill would be most injurious to the citrus fruit interests of his State, and said that while he knew his opposition would be futile, still he would feel that he had been recreant to his trust if he did not state his position.

Mr. McCreary took the opposite view of American obligations to Cuba.

"We must not mar," he said, "our great record of magnanimity, of generosity, but must go on and insure to Cuba commercial prosperity and financial success."

He would amend the bill, he said, so as to repeal the differential duty on sugar, and would strike out the five years' clause, but whether these amendments were adopted or not he would vote for the bill, because he believed its benefits would exceed any evils which might arise from its passage.

"There is," he added, "a break in the ranks of the stand-pat Republicans, and the day is breaking for the Democrats who advocate tariff reform."

Mr. McCreary contended that the Republicans have no right to say that reciprocity is exclusively a Republican doctrine, saying that Thomas Jefferson had advocated the same policy before the Republican Party was born and that President Pierce, a Democrat, had negotiated the treaty with Canada. "The best reciprocity treaty ever exchanged between nations."

Mr. McCreary referred at some length to the agitation for a protective policy in Great Britain, which he said had been induced by our own tariff policy. "If," he said, "under the able and accomplished Chamberlain a law should be enacted closing the markets of that country by as high a tariff rate as our own, and if Great Britain should allow free trade with her colonies, it is not difficult to see what the result would be."

CALL OUR TROOPS FROM CUBA.

Contaminated Water and Incomplete Naval Stations Cause for Order.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The joint army and navy board, which recently visited the United States naval stations at Guantanamo and Bahia Honda, Cuba, has reported that it will be at least a year before either of these stations will be ready for a coast artillery force.

In view of this report, the War Department has determined to withdraw the artillery companies now at Havana and Santiago and keep them in the United States until such time as they are needed at the naval stations.

The reasons assigned by Lieut. Gen. Young, Chief of Staff, and by Major Gen. Chaffee, his assistant, for bringing the companies back to the United States are the condition of the water supply at Havana and Santiago.

"The water at Santiago has become contaminated, and in order for the men to remain until the two naval stations are ready for them it would be necessary to build a new pumping station. This was not deemed advisable.

Gen. Chaffee, who was a member of the board, which made a visit to Cuba, emphatically denied the suggestion that Cuba might have indicated a wish for the recall of the troops.

TO REDUCE THE WORLD'S NAVIES.

Resolution Presented in Congress Looking to Decreased Armament Generally.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—Representative Gibson of Tennessee to-day introduced a resolution directed toward the reduction of the naval armament of the maritime nations of the world.

It authorizes the President "to open negotiations with such and so many of the maritime nations of the earth as he may deem expedient for the purpose of formulating some international agreement, whereby the naval armaments of each nation shall be reduced to the minimum consistent with the adequate policing of its own waters and shores and the protection of its own citizens in other lands; the international suppression of piracy, privateering, and letters of marque on the high seas, and, with the efficient enforcement of international obligations and the maintenance of the international peace."

QUAY POSTMASTER STAYS.

Mr. Roosevelt Declines to Remove Col. McMichael of Philadelphia.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The President acted to-day in the matter of charges against Postmaster Clayton McMichael of Philadelphia, and the incident is closed with the record showing that Col. McMichael made a good and sufficient defense. The Civil Service Commission had unanimously urged the removal of Col. McMichael, who is a Quay man.

The case grew out of charges sent to the Civil Service Commission last year. It was asserted that letter carriers had been required by State Senator George Vare, who is the boss for the First and Thirty-ninth Wards, to do political work in the campaign last Fall, and that four carriers in the First Ward had been transferred to routes in West Philadelphia, far from their homes, as a punishment for their refusal to obey the commands of the political bosses.

Civil Service Commissioner Cooley was sent to Philadelphia to investigate the matter over a month ago. Although he did not find it an easy task to get at the facts in the case he succeeded in getting substantially a confirmation of the various charges.

When he questioned Postmaster McMichael as to whether it was true or not that George Vare, his brother, or Representative Bingham, had asked him to discipline the letter carriers who had defied the bosses, Col. McMichael refused to make any reply. This was in violation of the Executive order making it the duty of a Postmaster or other Federal official to give the Civil Service Commission information necessary for the execution of the civil service law.

After the full consideration of the case the Civil Service Commission unanimously recommended to the President that Postmaster McMichael be removed.

The President sent for Col. McMichael and submitted to him the papers. Col. McMichael said that he knew of no political interference with the management of the Philadelphia Post Office. He said that changes of the routes of carriers were not infrequently made for reasons that seemed best to himself and his subordinates. So far as he knew, none of the transfers mentioned in the charges was asked by State Senator Vare or his brother or by Gen. Bingham.

He said he had threatened to dismiss a carrier who had testified falsely, and he repeated that the man had sworn falsely and that he saw no reason to make any defense against that charge.

It was decided that the vital question in the case was whether the particular transfers made had been dictated by the Vare brothers or any political worker or manager, and there was nothing for the President to do under the circumstances but to accept Col. McMichael's explanation. The papers were turned over to the Postmaster General and placed on file in the Post Office Department, and there the matter rests.

RATHBONE ON WOOD ACCOUNTS

Writes to Secretary Root About Them—Mr. Hanna Will Ask to Have Gen. Wood Subpoenaed.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—Major Estes G. Rathbone to-day addressed the following letter to Secretary Root:

The public press records the writing of a letter by you to the Senate Committee on Relations with Cuba renewing your request of last January to have printed the itemized accounts of receipts and expenditures of the military government of Cuba from Jan. 1, 1899, to May 20, 1902, inclusive.

I write to ask if this request includes the accounts of Gen. Wood in Santiago from about July to December, 1898, inclusive, now come to be known as the Wood '98 accounts.

As you probably know, the attention of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs was recently called to these accounts in a written communication by one of the auditing officers of Cuba, who with others attempted to audit them, in which he characterized the Wood '98 accounts as "the worst tangled mass I ever saw."

He states that a Wall Street expert of eighteen years' standing (giving his name) said that the Wood '98 accounts "were beyond anything he had ever seen in or out of Wall Street," and added, "No human agency will ever be able to straighten out these accounts. There are no vouchers supporting payments in scores of cases," &c.

I might add that on Nov. 18, ultimo, I requested the Senate Military Committee to subpoena this ex-auditing officer above referred to.

Senator Hanna has decided to request the Senate Committee on Military Affairs to subpoena Gen. Wood to answer some of the charges made against him by opponents of his confirmation as Major General. The committee expected to close its hearing Dec. 16, but it is now believed that at least two weeks more will be required. Should Gen. Wood be subpoenaed an adjournment will be taken to give him time to return from the Philippines.

Senator Platt of Connecticut, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Relations with Cuba, to-day introduced a resolution authorizing the printing of all the accounts of the Government of Cuba during American occupation. The resolution is in accord with a request by Secretary Root, and the statement will cover the accounts of Gen. Wood as Governor General of Cuba. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MAY QUESTION MACARTHUR.

War Department Likely to Ask an Explanation of the General's Alleged Statements.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The statements attributed to Gen. MacArthur, as contained in last night's dispatch from Honolulu, in which he is alleged to have predicted war in the immediate future between the United States and Germany, have come to the notice of Secretary Root.

In an interview to-day the Secretary said the only information he had on the subject was what was in the newspapers. He did not regard it as a case calling for action by him, inasmuch as the dispatch quoted Gen. MacArthur as saying that the statements in Col. Jones's report did not correctly represent his views in any particular and utterly misrepresented them in some.

Mr. Root asserted that the fact that remarks of this character were made in private conversation would not necessarily shield an officer from the requirement of an explanation, but added that Gen. MacArthur's denial carried with it the weight of an explanation. He therefore would take no action.

It is understood, however, that the matter was discussed at the meeting of the Cabinet to-day, as a result of which it seems likely that Secretary Root will modify his view and, in the interest of fairness to Gen. MacArthur, call upon him for an explanation upon his arrival in the United States in the latter part of this month.

MORO ANTI-SLAVERY LAW.

Proclaimed by Gen. Wood—Sultan and Datios Promise to Respect It.

MANILA, Dec. 11.—Major Gen. Leonard Wood has proclaimed in the Moro provinces an anti-slavery law, passed in October by the Legislative Council of the provinces.

Upon the promise of the Sultan and Datos to abide by its conditions Gen. Wood has suggested to Gov. Taft the establishment of the native Moros on lands which will be assigned to them by the Sultan and

TO SAVE LIFE AND LIMB

Movement Started to Establish a Museum of Security.

In It Will Be Shown All Inventions Designed as Safeguards Against Accidents—Accident Statistics.

If American railroad companies and mine owners and manufacturers would provide adequate safeguards for their employes, say the leaders of the movement for a museum of security, the fatal accidents befalling such employes would be decreased more than 50 per cent. annually. It is with a view of establishing this museum, filled with models of safety appliances, that the American Institute of Social Service is holding a series of evening meetings, the first of which was addressed last night by Dr. Josiah Strong and Dr. William H. Tolman in the Institute's rooms at 105 East Twenty-second Street.

"During the last five years," said Dr. Strong, "there have been 88,600 killed on the railways of the United States. The injured in the same time have numbered 255,622. So the daily average of killed has been 21 and of injured 139. From these statistics it is seen that there are in this country to-day 51,882 persons who are condemned to death, to be executed on the railroads, within the next five years, taking into consideration the increase in travel. And you must remember that thousands of others are being killed in mines, factories, and building operations. John Mitchell tells us that two men die of injuries in the Pennsylvania anthracite mines every day.

"The Association of Industrialists in France is doing something in the line we urge, and there are several museums of security on the Continent. What we want here are working models of all safety appliances."

Dr. Strong quoted statistics to show that German and Austrian employes had profited much from the museums, and in Germany during a given period the fatalities numbered proportionately only one-fifth of those in America, while in Austria the proportion was even smaller.

He explained that the museum would contain not only models of devices to prevent accidents, but also exhibits of means to improve hygienic conditions.

Dr. Tolman's talk was accompanied by a stereopticon display. One picture showed a screen arrangement for catching any displaced bolt in a factory. Another model was that of an apparatus to prevent truckmen from breaking their legs while loading barrels.

Pictures from the Charlottenburg Museum, near Berlin, for which hundreds of thousands of dollars were appropriated by the Reichstag were shown. Among the models there were those of all sorts of hygienic clothes for men and women.

NOT SAFE FOR FIREMEN.

William Leary, Secretary of the Fire Department, yesterday sent the following letter to the State Board of Railway Commissioners concerning the protection of firemen from the third rail while working on the elevated railroad structures:

I am directed by the Commissioner to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 10th instant inclosing copies of letters from the Interborough Rapid Transit Company as to the third rail on the Manhattan structure, and from the Brooklyn Heights Railroad Company as to the third rail on the Brooklyn elevated railroads, and to say that while the Commissioner recognizes the advantage of cutting off the current, he feels it his duty to say that this will not meet the requirements for the safety of the Fire Department.

Any delay in cutting off the current would endanger the lives of the men, who must begin their work upon the elevated structure instantly upon their arrival; otherwise, fires might escape their control. They have of course no means of knowing whether the current has been cut off, or whether the rail is dead or alive.

Secretary Leary said that the Fire Commissioner, unlike Vice President E. P. Bryan of the Interurban Company, considers this matter to be of intense public interest, and is no sense a private affair.

GAMBLING CASES DROPPED.

Evidence Furnished by "Sleuth" Charles Jacobs Insufficient.

In Part I. of the Court of General Sessions yesterday Judge McMahon disposed of a large number of alleged gambling cases in which the District Attorney believed no conviction could be had. Among the cases disposed of was that of Samuel Hitchings, charged with being the doorkeeper of a gambling house at 23 West Thirty-third Street, which was raided on the same night that Canfield's was raided.

The bail bond in the case of Jack McAuliffe, the ex-pugilist, indicted on a charge of bookmaking, was also discharged, as were the bonds in the cases against the following-named persons:

Clarence O'Brien, otherwise known as "Paddy the Pig," arrested in December of last year on a charge of keeping a poolroom at his place, corner of Thirty-sixth Street and Sixth Avenue; Patrick Powers, indicted on a charge of maintaining a gambling house at 200 West Thirty-third Street; Charles T. Thurber, charged with making book on the races at 12 Chambers Street; Joseph Young, charged with maintaining a gambling establishment at 259 West Thirty-ninth Street; Edward Kane, charged with making book at 101 West Forty-seventh Street.

In the majority of the cases disposed of the only evidence the prosecution had against the indicted men was that collected by the man known as "Sleuth" Charles Jacobs, who figured in the spectacular raid on Canfield's place.

A VICTIM OF PHILANTHROPY.

Cold Gray Dawn of the Morning After Brought Disaster for Blue-Eyed Protége of Man with a Sick Friend.

Singing from uncontrollable joyousness, but in a minor key, as befitting a man who has just left the bedside of a sick friend and is trying to think up incidents to lend local color to the story he is about to tell his bride of four months, Charles Cook was on his way to his Hoboken home yesterday morning, when he saw a pathetic figure on the steps of a house. The hour was so early, or so late, that he was debating whether he had not better amplify his story by telling of two sick friends instead of one. The wind was bitterly cold.

The pathetic figure was that of a young woman, and she was sobbing. Mr. Cook's chivalry and pity both were appealed to. He stopped singing and inquired the cause of the tears.

"I have no home, and I am cold and hungry," replied the young woman, as she turned her big blue eyes, all swimming in tears, on the sympathetic Mr. Cook. As an afterthought she added: "And I have no money."

Mr. Cook was in a quandary. Quarter by quarter he had spent all his ready change in buying medicine for his sick friend, and for a moment it seemed to him that he would have to pass on and leave the blue-eyed sufferer to the mercy of the Winter night. Then a happy thought came to him.

"Don't cry," he urged. "You can go home with me. My wife will take care of you. She'll love you like a sister—or at least like some kind of a relative," he amended, as a misgiving momentarily sweet over him.

The blue-eyed one dried her eyes, pushed back her fluffy hair, and promptly joined Mr. Cook, who continued his journey home in a frame of mind that held naught but self-approval.

Reaching his house, he found it in darkness, and correctly surmised that his wife had retired.

"Never mind," he said to his blue-eyed companion. "There's her room. Go in softly and go to sleep. She'll be astonished when she finds you in the morning."

The blue-eyed one obeyed instructions, while Mr. Cook went to the adjoining room and slept soundly. He was awakened a few hours later by sounds of strife. He heard his wife saying:

"If you'd have been a burglar it wouldn't have been so bad, but if my husband brought you here—"

The speech ended in a wail. Mr. Cook was disturbed. It was daylight, and philanthropy was not the same as in the night. Suddenly there was a crash, a rush, and he saw the blue-eyed one fleeing as from wrath. He thought it best to take a walk, too.

Mrs. Cook went before Recorder Stanton later in the day and had her husband summoned to court. The Recorder said he could do nothing.

"These philanthropists are always getting into trouble," he declared, as he dismissed the case.

WOMAN IN WRONG BED.

Drowsy Mrs. Kennedy Occupies Couch of Mrs. Gross, to Whom She is an Utter Stranger, and is Arrested.

Mrs. Kate Kennedy mistook the home of Mrs. Sophie Gross, at 154 East Twenty-eighth Street, for her own on Thursday night and went to sleep in Mrs. Gross's bed, after having pulled the blankets over her head. When Mrs. Gross lit the gas in her room and saw the figure in the bed she screamed. The outcry aroused her lodgers, and they entered the room with various weapons, ready to attack the intruder. When they turned down the covers and saw a woman sleeping soundly they were astonished.

The sleeper, in a tired voice, told them all to go away and leave her alone. They sent for a policeman. He managed to awake Mrs. Kennedy with the help of the women of the household, and left it to them to help her dress. When it was announced that the stranger was fully attired the policeman took her to the East Thirty-fifth Street Station. There she went to sleep as soon as she had been placed in a cell.

When Mrs. Kennedy was arraigned before Magistrate Peel in the Yorkville Police Court yesterday she entered a general and dreamy protest. It was all true, as Mrs. Gross had said, but there was something to be added in explanation. She had no idea as to how she had gone to sleep in Mrs. Gross's bed. She had left her husband, then living at 321 East Fifth Street, two days before because, as she stated, he had refused to support her. She had taken lodging two doors from the home of Mrs. Gross, and not being familiar with the neighborhood had entered the wrong house.

It was true that she had two glasses of beer with a friend before retiring to what she had considered her bed, and that the beer might have caused her to sleep so soundly that they had to call for a policeman to awaken her. She was afraid that the beer might have gone to her head. Mrs. Gross was quite positive that the woman ought to be sent away for a long time, but Magistrate Peel said that Mrs. Kennedy had done no wrong and that she had made a mistake for which she was punished with a warning.

BAD CHECKS FOR LAWYERS

Mr. Gottman, Seeking Divorce, Touched Hearts and Purses.

Justice-Elect Sanders Among Those Who Took Case of Tearful Client, but He Escaped Money Loss.

If Justice-elect Leon Sanders of the Thirteenth District Municipal Court had dared go to his law office, at 300 Broadway, yesterday, he would have received the felicitations of a score of his friends who called to ask about his latest divorce case. But Mr. Sanders awoke to the fact that the visitors had elected him President of the H. Z. Mark Club, hid somewhere, while his partner, Moses Feltenstein, told the story of how a stranger with a pathetic story, after reaping profit out of a dozen other counselors, finally struck Mr. Sanders Wednesday evening.

Up to yesterday afternoon eight lawyers of the east side had admitted that they gave up to the impostor from $20 to $50 each, and Mr. Sanders, although he lost no cash, had kept his office busy for a whole day preparing legal papers in the divorce of one Max Gottman.

"My client is a rich man," the Judge-elect had told his partner. "But, you know, he has been treated so shamefully by his miserable wife that I hate to take his money. He's the most persecuted man I ever met. Really, I feel a great interest in the case."

It appears that Max Gottman, looking like a man of affluence, launched himself into the east side only a few weeks ago. As far as the records go, he first approached Samuel Zipper, a lawyer attached in the office of Moses Feltenstein, at 300 Broadway, and said:

"Three years ago I was wedded to a beautiful young woman. Aint she is no longer beautiful in my eyes." Drawing out a voluminous silk handkerchief, he brushed aside a tear. "For a while life was a dream. We rented a lovely cottage up in the Bronx—vines around the pizza, grass and flowers all about. I had saved money. I spent it for diamonds. I lavished my affection and my savings upon her. Ach, Gott! We went to the opera. We took trips to the beautiful country.

"Then we thought we had better cut expenses a little. We took a boarder—only one boarder—just to help along a little. That was the cause of all the trouble."

The client paused in his tearful narration. Mr. Zipper was all sympathy. When the tale was continued Gottman explained that Mrs. Gottman had met his remonstrances by telling him to depart for other regions, or words to that effect. Then she had vanished with the boarder. Later they had been discovered in Brooklyn.

At last the visitor asked what would be the fee for a divorce suit. Zipper said $100 would be about right. Gottman pulled out a check for $20, signed by "A. Kaufman & Co." On the edge was stamped the Kaufman firm name, and the document was indorsed, so that any one could cash it.

"But I can't give you all this just now," said Gottman. "I must have some small amount this afternoon."

"Oh, suppose you pay $20 to-day and the rest later," interposed the lawyer. "That'll be all O. K. We can settle the rest any time, Sig."

The result was that Gottman gave up the check and received $50 in cash as change, after which he bowed himself out, leaving his counsel well pleased.

On Wednesday evening Mr. Gottman called at the residence of Judge-elect Sanders, who was dressing for a theatre party. After the same preliminaries he told a story exactly like the one Zipper had heard. Mr. Sanders felt in his pocket, but he had no more than enough money for his evening's amusement, and so he said:

"Come back to-morrow night, and by that time I'll have all the papers drawn up. You can give me the retainer then."

So it happened that the clerical force of the law office was busy Thursday on the papers. Toward the finish Mr. Feltenstein heard of it. The Judge-elect told the Gottman story graphically. Feltenstein roared. It was Zipper's yarn over again.

In spite of Mr. Sanders's appeals, his partner spread the story broadcast. Then other lawyers of the east side came around and all their like experiences. Charles Dushkind of the Tombs Court Building had given Gottman $20 in change for a check signed "A. Meyers & Co." Jacob Gordon of the Bowery Bank Building had lost $40 in a similar transaction. Louis Goldberg of 6 Bongart Street was out $47. Each had the check and the bank in every case had returned it as "N. G."

Inquiries among firms of the name of Meyer and Kaufman showed that the checks were all fraudulent.

TELL OF WOMAN'S FORGERY.

Detective Witness Is Greeted with a Smile by Mabel Parker.

Many well-dressed women and a large delegation of men well known about town were in the courtroom of Part II. of the General Sessions yesterday when Mabel Parker was arraigned to stand trial on a charge of forgery. The young woman has announced to her acquaintances that she intends to write a novel when her case is ended, and that she is under contract to weave a thread of romance about the real facts which will be brought out on the trial, so that she will appear in the role of a much-abused heroine. As there are ten indictments for forgery hanging over her head, she has not definitely decided where she will pursue her literary labors.

The specific complaint yesterday was to the effect that she had forged the name of Mrs. Alice Kauser of 1,462 Broadway to a check for $350 drawn on the Lincoln National Bank. Assistant District Attorney Train said that the woman went to a jewelry shop in Maiden Lane, where she obtained a ring and cash by presenting the forged check. Her arrest followed with that of her husband, who is now in the Tombs awaiting sentence for the part he had played in the wholesale game of forgery.

Mrs. Alice Kauser identified the check, which had turned up at the Lincoln Bank, where she has an account. John Williams, the bank teller, told how he had certified the check because Mrs. Kauser had an account at the bank, and he believed at the time that his signature was genuine.

Charles F. Vodiksz, a jewelry salesman, told how the defendant had called at the store and selected a diamond ring valued at $[illegible]. He had accepted the check after the bank had certified it. He identified the husband of the defendant as the man who had accompanied her and who took part in the transaction.

When Detective Sergeant Frank Peabody was called to the witness stand, the woman in trial bowed to him and smiled. He returned his recognition. Peabody testified that he had followed the woman to a house at 10 West Thirty-eighth Street, where she resided. This was on the night of Aug. [illegible]. Her husband was under arrest at the time at Police Headquarters, and she had come there to see him. After learning her address the detective said he called at the house ostensibly for an interview with her by telling her he had been a cell mate of her husband, and that her husband sent him to her for the purpose of getting some morphine.

"I told her I was a thief," continued the detective, "and in this way she made a confident of me. She accompanied me down to headquarters with morphine and a hypodermic syringe to give to her husband. Then we dined at the Broadway Central Hotel. She told me she had written the check which her husband was anxious to forge. I learned that she was flighty and not able to do such fine work. She then said she would prove it to my satisfaction.

"After the dinner I accompanied her back to the house where she was boarding. There we continued the talk about checks. She told me that she had been pinched in Buffalo, that her proper name was Mabel Preece. I said that if I made $500 out of her forged check game I would give it to her husband Jim to help him out. She suggested that we pinch the mail from the letter boxes up town, which would give us letters containing signatures which could be used later to forge to checks. I told her my name was Hickey, and wrote the name making her if she could imitate it. She did it and gave me samples of her work on a pad of paper which I pretended to destroy, but which I preserved."

She told him the detective said that she had forged the Kauser check.

Mrs. Florence M. Creighton, the landlady of the house in which the defendant lived, testified that one night when she searched Mabel Parker's room during her absence she had found a genuine check torn in pieces. This was a stolen check, from which the prosecution alleges Mabel Parker obtained a copy of a signature which she forged later. The witness added that she had frequently seen the defendant writing checks in her room.

David Carvalho, the handwriting expert, testified that the forged checks were in the writing of the person who had written the name of Hickey for the detective. The trial will be resumed on Monday.

BOY FLED IN UNDERCLOTHES.

Beasley Braved Cold to Get Away from St. John's Home.

Without hat, shoes, or stockings, and clad only in his underwear, Walter Beasley, thirteen years old, escaped from St. John's Home, at St. Mark's and Albany Avenues, Brooklyn, in the cold at 4 o'clock yesterday morning. The lad was placed in the home on Wednesday by his sister, Mrs. Joseph Howe of 65 Wilson Street, with whom he lived.

When his escape was discovered he had disappeared from the neighborhood. The police hunted unsuccessfully for him. They could not understand how the boy could get away, dressed as he was.

WOODBURY WINS ASH SUIT.

Appellate Division Decides Against Department Stores.

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court yesterday handed down a decision affirming the order of Justice Truax in Special Term denying a peremptory writ of mandamus asked for by several department stores against John M. Woodbury, Commissioner of Street Cleaning.

The petitioners, who are members of the Retail Dry Goods Association, sought to compel Commissioner Woodbury to remove the ashes from in front of their department stores. The Commissioner declined to remove the ashes from such establishments on the ground that his appropriation was insufficient. He refused also to remove the ashes, light rubbish, and "trade waste" of all large business houses and office buildings, claiming that he could not do their work without neglecting to a dangerous extent the most necessary and essential work of the department. He claimed that the output of steam ashes had become so enormous as to go entirely beyond the capacity of the department to handle.

Justice Patterson wrote the opinion of the court, in which the other Justices concur, or at least in the result. Presiding Justice Van Brunt, however, wrote the following separate and exceedingly brief opinion:

"I concur in the result. I do not think the Commissioner is bound to remove trade waste, whether in the form of ashes, garbage, or any other form of refuse matter."

LEGAL NOTES.

THE AUTOMOBILE LAW.—The District Attorney, in seeking to uphold before the Appellate Division the conviction of William H. Ellis for operating an automobile at the rate of eight miles an hour, admitted that the finding of guilt against Mr. Ellis could not be sustained under the law of 1903, prescribing that no ordinance shall require an automobile to travel at a slower speed than eight miles an hour in a city nor fifteen miles in the country, and making the violation of the statute a misdemeanor, but argued that, as the proof showed that the defendant had disobeyed the Penal Code section prohibiting a greater speed than eight miles an hour unless allowed by ordinance, the conviction should be affirmed. The Appellate Court, however, decided that, as Mr. Ellis was tried under the law of 1903, he cannot be convicted nor sentenced for a violation he was not charged with. "Before a person can be legally convicted of a crime," said Justice McLaughlin, for the court, "he is entitled to be informed of precisely the charge which is made against him, to the end that he may properly defend himself. Defendant was charged, tried, and sentenced for violating the act of 1903. His defense was directed to showing that he was not guilty of such violation. Had he been charged with the committing of another crime, viz., violating Section 666 of the Penal Code, we are unable to say what defense he would have made. He would have had the right to prove that an ordinance had been passed by the city permitting him to run an automobile at the rate of speed at which he was running his at the time he was arrested, or to question the constitutionality of this section." The court adds that it is useless to speculate, and orders a reversal.

DEALINGS WITH MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.—A case that should serve as a warning to those having business dealings with the different departments of the city to see to it that all provisions of the charter regarding such dealings are strictly observed, was decided yesterday by the Appellate Division. The action before the court was one brought by James R. Keane and another to recover for supplies furnished to the Fire Department. The charter provides (Section 419) that "no expenditure for work or supplies involving an amount for which no contract is required (less than $1,000) shall be made except the necessity therefor be certified to by the head of the appropriate department." The claim in the suit was for $4,047.76, but it was conceded that not over $1,000 worth of supplies were ordered at any one time. The goods were furnished at the instance of a so-called purchasing agent of the Fire Department. Because the plaintiff failed to produce a certificate of the Fire Commissioner showing the necessity for the supplies, the Appellate Court reverses a judgment in his favor. It is the court's opinion that in such cases as the one under consideration there must be a full and complete compliance with the charter provisions to charge the city with liability. "It has been repeatedly held," said Justice O'Brien, in giving the opinion, "that municipal and other public bodies can act only in the way prescribed in their charters or acts of incorporation." The following head note from the case of McDonald vs. Mayor, (68 N. Y., 23,) is quoted: "Where the municipal charter prohibits its officers from contracting in its behalf for the purchase of material save in cases and in a manner specified, the municipality is neither liable upon a contract made by an official in violation of, or without a compliance with the requirements of the charter, nor can the value of material furnished under the contract be recovered upon any implied liability."

GROUT'S BRIDGE QUERIES

Had to be Assured by Lindenthal That Structure Really Would Be Opened Before He Consented.

Owing to the opposition of Controller Grout to voting for the twenty-thousand-dollar appropriation for the "opening" celebration for the Williamsburg Bridge on Dec. 19, the whole matter was held up for several hours yesterday in the meeting of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. Finally, after a hurry call had been sent by Mayor Low for Bridge Commissioner Lindenthal, and the latter had gone over the bridge situation in detail, the Controller consented to allow the appropriation to go through for the celebration, although saying that he thought the matter might just as well stand over for a few months.

When the board met, President Fornes of the Board of Aldermen was away, and it required a unanimous vote for the passage of the special revenue bonds required by the appropriation. Therefore a call also was sent to Vice Chairman McInnes of the Board of Aldermen, who acts as a member of the board during the absence of President Fornes. Mr. McInnes was not found until several hours later. In the meantime the Controller declared that he should not vote away the money unless it was clearly demonstrated to him that the bridge could be kept open continually after Dec. 19.

"I intend to investigate this matter thoroughly," he said, "as I don't see any sense in opening a bridge one day and closing it the next. We might then be called upon another year for another appropriation for an 'opening.'"

When Commissioner Lindenthal appeared before the board he said:

"Whoever started the report that the Williamsburg Bridge will not be ready to be opened on Dec. 19 did so from malicious motives. The bridge will be formally opened Dec. 19 with the celebration. Then, on the day following, Sunday, it will be open for public inspection. On Monday morning, Dec. 21, at 5 o'clock, it will be open for vehicular traffic, and we shall commence to take tolls, the same fares being charged as now are imposed on the Brooklyn Bridge. All vehicles will go over the south roadway, which then will be completed. As it is twenty feet wide it will allow all vehicles to pass. Ten days later the north roadway will probably be finished, and then that can be used for pedestrians. Until the north roadway is completed pedestrians will have to use the south roadway with vehicles going both ways. The footways are not in shape yet, but will be in a few months."

After the Commissioner had finished the bond proposition again was laid aside to await the arrival of Mr. McInnes, in order to have a full board present. Later, just before adjournment, the matter was called up and put to a vote, and passed.

"It could just as well have been allowed to go over for a few months," said the Controller as he was leaving the room, "but if they say that even the south roadway can be opened and kept open for traffic I am willing to let the celebration and 'opening' go on."

If the evening programme is carried out according to the arrangements now completed, the fireworks display will be one of the most spectacular ever given in the vicinity of New York. Aside from the portraits in fire of the outgoing and incoming Mayors, there will be thousands of aerial bombs, fire balloons, rockets, jeweled mines, electric comets, winged dragons, and several pyrotechnic pieces. Among the latter will be a representation in fire of Niagara Falls, showing the rapids in flames of vari-colored lights, which will extend from the bridge structure down to the water's edge.

Then there will be hanging gardens of pyrotechnic flowers, suspended in the air with the aid of parachutes; a representation of the northern lights, which will be visible from all parts of town, and picturesque forests of fire. All of this will be in addition to the illumination of the bridge from end to end in changing colored lights.

AFTER STRAW BAIL MEN.

District Attorney and Police Making a Round-Up.

For several months past a secret investigation has been going on in the District Attorney's office for the purpose of rounding up all of the professional bondsmen and straw bail men around town. Police Commissioner Greene and Deputy Commissioner Piper have been assisting in collecting the evidence.

The results obtained thus far show that the bondsmen referred to have been working in all of the police stations in Manhattan; that they have given other persons's property as bail in scores of cases, and that in some instances a bondsman owning but $200 worth of household property has furnished as many as 200 bonds by giving the same property as security in each case.

In a lengthy typewritten report submitted to the District Attorney by the Police Department yesterday a list of the station house bondsmen is given, together with the cases in which they have figured and the number of cases of perjury charged to the account of each man. All of the evidence collected was placed in the hands of Assistant District Attorney Karl Miner, who, after a consultation with District Attorney Jerome, drew up a sample complaint for the purpose of setting the legal machinery at work against the offenders. This complaint was laid before Magistrate Breen in the Centre Street Police Court, and he immediately issued a warrant for the arrest of a man known as the bondsman of the Red Light District. This man was taken into custody by detectives attached to Inspector Schmittberger's staff and brought to the Criminal Courts Building.

He said he was Henry Froehlich, thirty-five years old, a butcher, of 1,871 Third Avenue. Mr. Miner charged him with perjury. He pleaded not guilty, and was committed to the Tombs in default of furnishing $5,000. His case will be hurried along to the Grand Jury, so that that body will have a chance to take up the entire matter of the bonds with a view to finding indictments against the others named in the Police Department's report.

According to this report, Froehlich has furnished the bonds in 116 cases, which figured in the Fifteenth Police Precinct within a period of ten months, beginning Jan. 1 and ending Oct. 31 last. The bonds were given at the Red Light Station House, known as the Fifth Street Station.

The specific complaint made against Froehlich yesterday was that he had furnished bail for a woman named Kittie Brown, arrested on April 16 last, giving as security property at 2,060 Washington Avenue, which is said to be really owned by Mrs. Mary McKenna.

In this case, it is alleged, the owner of the property was not even acquainted with the bondsman, and knew nothing about him until her attorney commenced an investigation to find out who was using the property for bonding purposes. This discovery, it was said, was made by the lawyer if the case when he went to search the title to the property.

Assistant District Attorney Miner, who has been collecting the evidence in the bond cases, said yesterday that District Attorney Jerome had so far this year succeeded in collecting more money on forfeited bonds than had ever been collected before. Thus far the amount collected figured up $34,500.

In addition to collecting this money, Mr. Miner said the District Attorney had succeeded in sending five of the fake bondsmen to Sing Sing. Of these five, Charles, otherwise known as Alphonse Stercka, an old offender, had recently been sentenced to State prison for a term not less than two years and six months and not to exceed three years and six months. He was convicted with Peter Shortell on a bond given at the Sheriff's office in the case of Leo J. Leahy and another against Woodford M. Davis. Shortell, the other surety in this case, is dead.

COLORADO FUEL COMMITTEE.

Plans to Rearrange Affairs of the Company—Additional $6,200,000 Common Stock Issue Urged.

A committee, consisting of James A. Blair, William L. Bull, Otto T. Bannard, Philip Lehman, and John E. Borne was organized yesterday to assist in placing the affairs of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company on a permanent financial basis.

The committee, in an address to holders of Colorado Fuel 5 per cent. debentures, says that $18,600,000 will be required to recover property recently sold by the company, and at the same time provide sufficient money to complete improvements now under way.

The plan provides for the creation of a funding mortgage, to be made by the company or by another corporation, to secure an issue of bonds, which, with a stock increase of $6,200,000, will be used to provide the necessary funds, and also in exchange for present debentures. The new security will be a 5 per cent. gold bond, supported by a consolidated first mortgage directly upon all the properties recently sold by the company.

Stockholders will be asked to authorize the increase of the existing common stock by about $6,200,000. This increased stock, together with the bonds, will be used to provide the money necessary for the purpose of the company. A syndicate representing a majority of the stock of the company has agreed to convey these properties to the fuel company, or to the committee, for the price at which they were acquired, plus reasonable interest. The syndicate also agrees to underwrite, without commissions, as much of the proposed new issue of bonds and stock as may be needed to provide the cash requirements, receiving one one-thousand-dollar bond and $200 of stock for each $800 paid.

Such of the bonds and stock so underwritten and not taken by stockholders or debenture holders will be taken and paid for by the syndicate at the price named. The plan provides for payment of the next maturing coupon on debentures deposited under the proposed plan, in case such plan shall become operative.

Consolidated Exchange Death Fund.

A movement has been put under way on the Consolidated Stock Exchange to amend the constitution in its application to the payment of death benefits to the families of deceased members. At present there is a large fund accumulated by past payments, and this it is proposed to restrict to those members who have shared in its accumulation. Members joining after Jan. 1, 1904, will, it is planned, have a part only in such payments as they and others like them may contribute, with a per cent. added. The amendment will come up for vote on Dec. 17.

Steel Trust Men May Retire.

It was reported yesterday that George E. McCague, chief traffic manager of the United States Steel Corporation at Pittsburg, will retire from the service of the company on Jan. 1. It was also reported that Charles E. Murray, former chief chemist of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works of the Carnegie Company, would retire on the same day. Official confirmation of those reports could not be obtained.

Colonial Trust Dividend.

The Board of Trustees of the Colonial Trust Company has declared the usual semi-annual dividend of 3 per cent. payable Jan. 2, 1904, to stockholders of record Dec. 19, 1903.

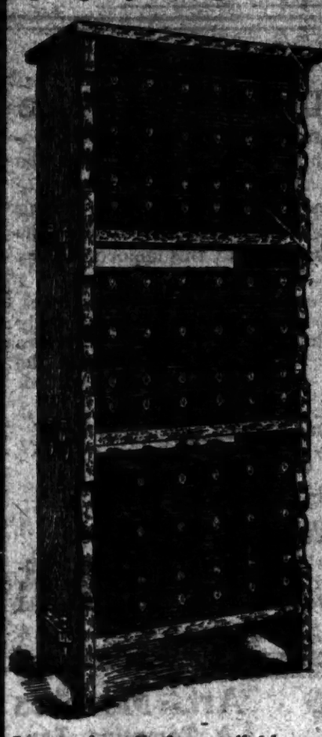
When the Monitor and Merrimac met in Hampton Roads they were the two best fighting ships afloat. Every encyclopædia in current use to-day will tell all about them, but that was forty years ago.



When Mr. Cleveland was President of the United States the real progress of the United States Navy to a modern fighting basis was begun. That was twenty years ago. Some encyclopædias can give information about the beginning of this new navy, but not many.

Off Santiago was fought the greatest battle between modern naval vessels. It was an event in which the entire world was interested; it helped to change history, geography, to destroy a world power and create a new nation. That occured five years ago.

Look in an encyclopædia for something about it. When you have searched all others, take down The New International and read what you are searching for.

Thousands of similar instances might be mentioned.

The years fly swiftly. The world has learned more, men have done more, progress has been greater in the last quarter of a century than ever before.

An encyclopædia which does not include this period is antiquated and valueless.

The New International Encyclopædia is new, newer by ten years than any other. It is no reprint; every article in it is newly written and edited by men best informed on that subject.

At enormous expense hundreds of the ablest writers of to-day have been engaged collecting, compiling, editing the matter which now in print makes this work the only new, modern and complete encyclopædia in the English language. It contains all the available matter of the older encyclopædias, newly written. In addition there is the new matter, 30,000 more subjects than are treated in any other encyclopædia.

The New International Encyclopædia is a magnificent work of 17 octavo volumes containing over 16,000 pages, 7,000 excellent illustrations 100 full-page colored plates. More than 100,000 subjects are discussed.

Are not these sufficient reasons why any thinking man who wants an encyclopædia for the information it contains should at once reject the idea of buying any other than The New International, and in buying turn to that which will tell him what he wishes to know, with the certainty of getting all that is newest, latest, and correct on any subject he may seek?

It would make a magnificent Christmas present.

It would, of course, be impossible to tell all about such a work in an advertisement, but we have prepared an 80-page handsomely illustrated book which tells in detail nearly all that may be told without examination of the Encyclopædia itself. This book we would like to send you, together with discounts and easy payments and easy-payment plan. Sent free. Ask for it to-day. If you have an old encyclopædia write us for terms of exchange.

Record—2,[illegible] miles 1 lap.

With the exception of an occasional flurry caused by some one of the more intrepid riders trying to gain a lap on their fellows, the six-day bicycle race in Madison Square Garden was more monotonous yesterday than on any day since the contest began. Eleven teams kept up the continuous grind which has been sufficiently slow to leave them over 300 miles behind the record established by Miller and Waller four years ago. There seems to be very little chance of the relative positions of the teams being changed until the final sprint shall decide the winner tonight. Occasionally some of the men in the front division attempted to gain an advantage yesterday by breaking away quickly in a wild sprint, and well helped in the effort by a team mate, but nothing came of any of these efforts, none of which lasted more than half a mile.

Many smart sprinting races were indulged in by the riders during the day, the incentive for their speedy work being offers of money prizes by some of the more enthusiastic onlookers. During the afternoon a stylishly dressed woman, who occupied a box on the south side of the Garden, attracted a great deal of attention by offering five-dollar bills to the riders who were the fastest in a series of short sprints, and four of the leaders, Butler, John Hedel, Floyd Krebs, and Bowlen, got a share of this money. In a five-lap race, Keegan, who, with his partner Moran, is just one lap behind the front division, defeated Butler by the narrowest of margins for one of these cash prizes. An attendant handed the money to Butler, but the spectators, who watched the result very carefully, appealed to the handler that Keegan had won, and after a noisy demonstration, which lasted nearly five minutes, the cash was transferred to Keegan.

Under the rules governing the contest each of the riders is allowed to ride only twelve hours out of any twenty-four. Some complaints, which were in the main unfounded, having been made to the police authorities that several of the riders were evading the law by riding more than the allotted number of hours, Police Capt. Burfeind of the Tenderloin Precinct placed Patrolman O'Connell and two relieving officers in the scorer's box in order to check the work done by the various individual competitors, but up to midnight none of these officials had reported any breach of the law.

A good deal of excitement was caused by the actions of an elderly woman who rushed across the track and across the track into the infield in the afternoon. Franz Krebs, who now is Goodwin's team mate, had to pull his wheel high up on the track in order to avoid collision with the woman, who, to his astonishment, claimed to be his aunt. Krebs dismounted and, with the assistance of one of the attendants, helped the woman back to her seat and the referee allowed Krebs to be credited with all the laps which had been tallied during this interruption.

Keegan and Moran made several attempts during the day to get on equal terms with the leading riders, but they were not successful. They repeated their rapid relief work which they tried on the two previous days, but they never got further than half a lap ahead of the front bunch, and each attempt was frustrated by some one of the fast sprinters before five laps had been covered.

Among the former winners of long-distance races who were watching the contests yesterday was Albert Schock, who, the first honors in the individual race which was decided two years ago. He said that the present race is much easier on the men than when he was riding for individual honors. Leander Fisher and Walthour, as named Schock thinks, will be the order at the finish, and he looks for a magnificent sprint to wind up the race.

"Jack" Prince, who trained Schock for his race, believes that Leander will win, while Eddie Bald and many other noted cyclists are of the opinion that Fisher will win first place, as they believe he can outsprint all the others when necessary.

The long-distance men pedaled around the base of the track last night, while a one-mile handicap sprint race was being decided. The event was won by George Schreiber, with an allowance of sixty yards. E. T. Root, with twenty yards, was second, and Willie Fenn, the scratch man, finished third, the winner's time being 2:06 2-5.

FOR PROFESSIONAL DRIVERS.

Automobile Club Committee Votes in Favor of Altering International Race Rules.

At a joint meeting of the Board of Governors and the Racing Committee of the Automobile Club of America held at the office of ex-President A. R. Shattuck yesterday afternoon, it was decided to support the proposition of the German Automobile Club to alter the rules governing the race for the Bennett International Automobile Racing Trophy so as to permit the owners of automobiles entered in that race to nominate professional drivers to operate them in the race. Instructions to this effect were cabled last night to Clarence G. Dinsmore, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the club, who will represent the Automobile Club of America at the meeting of the International Committee in charge of the coming race, to be held in Paris next Tuesday.

It is understood that the French and the British clubs also favor the proposition of the German organization, so that it is believed that the change will be made. In this case it is assured that Alexander Winton will enter a machine in the race and will name Barney Oldfield as his driver. There is also a chance that Harry Harkness and L. P. Mosers will again be competitors for the honor of representing this country in the international event.

Pratt Institute Basket Ball Games.

At the Pratt Institute gymnasium in Brooklyn this evening the Pratt basket ball team will play its first game of the season with the five of Columbia University. The Brooklyn boys, it is said, are well prepared to meet the strongest teams at the sport during the season, and their schedule calls for games with Williams College on Dec. 18, with Fordham College on Jan. 4, with Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn on Jan. 16, with Wesleyan University on Jan. 30, with University of Pennsylvania on Feb. 27, with Yale University second team on Feb. 27, and with Cornell University on March 12. All these games will be played at Pratt's gymnasium.

Ex-College Men to Play Football.

Quite a number of old favorites of the gridiron will play in the football tournament which begins at the Madison Square Garden on Monday night. Eight ex-college men will be found on the teams of the Watertown Athletic Association and the Franklins clubs. Chief among the Watertown players will be Draper, who was one of the best half backs in the game while playing with the Williams College eleven. Brickley, Vanderbilt's star half back, Mason, a Williams College full back, and Wallace, winner of the all-round athletic championship of the United States in 1902, with an quarter back, Sweet, one of Yale's best linesmen, and Dougherty, Princeton's cleverest pitcher, will be at centre.

On the Franklin team will be four graduates of the University of Pennsylvania, including Wallace, who played tackle and was Captain of the eleven; Tees, the crack guard; Kennedy, also a Captain, and quarter back, and Davidson, who was conceded to be one of the strongest centre players of his day.

Donaldson Wins at Billiards.

The game between J. Donaldson and H. Gardiner in the 14-inch balk line tournament at the Broadway Billiard Academy last night was rather slow and tedious, but this was due to the cagey tactics displayed by both players. Gardiner had to make 125 to Donaldson's 115, but the former was defeated by 2 points. The score:

J. Donaldson (115)—0 5 2 1 3 4 3 2 2 1 0 2 2 0 2 0 0 0 0 1 0 0 4 0 0 0 2 1 1 1 2. Total, 41. High run, 10. Average, 2-3-34.

The game to-night will be between H. Hall (150) and F. Wright (100.)

Educational Board on Football.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—The annual report of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, submitted to-day, contains the following in regard to football:

"The board has had its attention directed to a growing strenuousness and carelessness in inflicting injury in the football games between the schools. While highly appreciating the value of all reasonable athletic sports, the board will aim to sharply check all tendencies toward rowdyism and savagery which characterize the play of many of the prominent institutions of the country. The statistics of the game for the year show a startling list of players killed, and the serious maiming of many more. No self-respecting school organization should tolerate such manslaughter in the name of athletics, and the board will not fail to take notice of brutality in play, and if need be, in order to stop it to prohibit the game in the schools."

Hurley Harvard's Football Captain.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Dec. 11.—Daniel J. Hurley, who played right half back on the Harvard Varsity football team during the past season, was to-day elected Captain of the Varsity team of 1904. The men who participated in the election, which was unanimous, were those who played in the Pennsylvania and Yale games.

Hurley's home is in Charlestown, Mass., and he prepared for college at the Boston Latin School, where he not only played right half back on the football team, but acted as Captain during his last year. He played right half back on the freshman team last year, and also in that position in a number of the Varsity games last year. He filled the position on the team this year throughout the season.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S POPULARITY.

What Wall Street thinks of Mr. ROOSEVELT is a matter of very slight consequence. What the country thinks of him is important and vital. If the people of the country want him to be their President during the four years from March 4, 1905, to March 4, 1909, the opposition of Wall Street would be futile. Indeed, if he is really strong with the people the hostility of corporations and financiers would be likely not to weaken him, but to make him stronger.

The story which has gained wide newspaper currency to the effect that some of the chief men of Wall Street recently demanded of Mr. ROOSEVELT that he pledge himself, if he should be re-elected, not to do anything to "disturb business," is of no great interest save in one aspect. It has been said of the story that it is manifestly untrue, first, because the Wall Street gentlemen named would never demand such a pledge, and, second, because if the demand had been made Mr. ROOSEVELT is so consumedly anxious for the nomination that he would have given the required pledge. The first of these reasons is valid and sufficient; the second is conjectural and superfluous. The tale is interesting, however, because it would appear to have been put in circulation by friends of the President who thought it would be good politics to meet the attacks of his Wall Street opponents with a "back fire" of this nature. If the people want him for a candidate, if they are firmly resolved to elect him next Fall, the publication of the Wall Street story ought to evoke an outburst of tremendous popular enthusiasm for Mr. ROOSEVELT, coupled with angry denunciation of the corporations and the bankers. If that result follows the putting forth of the story of the demanded pledge will be completely justified as good tactics. If there is no such result, if the country does not rally round the President and signify its intention to rebuke the plutocrats, the invention of the story could scarcely be called good tactics—it would pass for very bad tactics, since it would give the friends of Mr. ROOSEVELT serious cause for fresh anxieties, of which they have already an uncomfortable oversupply.

The reports that come from many States of President ROOSEVELT's loss of strength and popularity are too numerous and too well authenticated to be ignored. The members of the Republican National Committee now assembled in Washington talk, for publication, of Mr. ROOSEVELT as the only candidate the party has in view. They represent the desire for his nomination to be unanimous. There is evidence that when talking not for publication, many members of the committee speak of a change in the Republican attitude toward the President. Instead of being unanimous the party is actually divided upon the question whether he should be its candidate next year. It is not necessary to go to Washington or to consult the Republican National Committee to learn this news. It is open to anybody who will listen to the speech of people to know that great numbers of Republicans now look with deep misgiving upon the popularity of Mr. ROOSEVELT's candidacy, which they fear would involve party defeat. It may be a temporary and curable condition, but unquestionably something has weakened Mr. ROOSEVELT's hold upon the Republican Party and upon the people.

The testimony as to the nature of this "something" runs all in one direction. There is want of confidence in the President's steadiness and sobriety of judgment. Conservative men are afraid of him, and they openly say so. They never know what he is going to do. They do not like his constant exhibitions of the fighting temper. He is habitually spoken of as a terrible fighting man. But they do not want to fight, they want peace. This is a land of peace. The fighting temperament they feel is a dangerous one particularly when the disposition to fight resides in a man in whose is vested the power to do vast harm. The course he has pursued on the business of Panama enjoys a surface popularity. But it was so irregular, high-handed, and so fraught with risk and possibilities of embroilment that conservatives, though they may be avowed partisans of an Isthmian canal, view the incident with apprehension as an evidence of the President's heedless impetuosity.

The Northern Securities suit may have been a very proper one for the Government to begin. Even in "Wall Street" the organization of the Securities Company has been freely criticised as coming too near the forbidden line of the Anti-Trust law. But the desire to begin proceedings against the so-called merger was a grave one, and it is now declared that it was taken on the responsibility of the President himself, without consulting those two speakers of his Cabinet, who, in the general judgment of the country, are his wisest and safest advisers. The final responsibility of all Executive policies is, of course, the President's. An Executive of unmanding ability, of wide and qualifying experience, and of conservative habit of mind might safely perform any of the functions of his office without taking the trouble to ask the views of advisers presumably inferior to himself in point of capacity. But the most unreserved admirers of Mr. ROOSEVELT would not pretend that he is such an Executive. He is neither a lawyer nor a man of business. Yet he did not hesitate to adopt a policy which any lawyer or any man of experience in affairs would have told him must result in grave disturbance to the business of the country. It has had that result. If he was to that extent unwarrantably self-reliant in a matter of this magnitude in which he may have been right, overweening confidence in his own judgment might at any moment betray him into disastrous decisions in other matters where he would be wrong.

Many instances of hasty and reckless action on the part of the President are cited in current discussions of his availability for renomination. The result of it all is, that the country appears to be withdrawing its confidence from him. Where it used to applaud it now fears and distrusts. Enthusiasm has given place to disquietude and apprehension. The country is beginning to feel that it would be better content with a less restless and self-assertive President.

HOW IT WOULD WORK.

We cannot think that the Union League Club would greatly advance the true interests of the colored man in the South or in the rest of the country if it could induce the Republican Party to take up and carry out the policy advocated in the resolutions of Thursday evening.

There are certain provisions in the new Constitutions of four of the Southern States which are probably opposed to the Constitution of the United States, since they confer the right of suffrage upon certain persons on the ground of descent—a condition with which the negroes cannot possibly comply. Still these provisions do not in terms "deny the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." It is, to say the least, doubtful whether the Supreme Court would condemn these provisions under the Fifteenth Amendment. There are other provisions which fix educational qualifications with which the great body of the negroes cannot now comply; they undoubtedly were intended in practice to exclude negroes, and they do have that effect. In terms they apply equally to whites, and if honestly applied, the standard of fitness for the suffrage would be an equal one. The Union League Club committee is quite uncertain whether the courts would hold that these educational tests are contrary to the Constitution of the United States, but we do not think there is much doubt that these tests do expose the States adopting them to a reduction of representation, and that this is equally true for the four New England States and the two Pacific States which also have adopted them.

Here, then, is the situation. There are four Southern States with provisions of doubtful constitutionality; there are eleven with provisions which expose them to a reduction of representation along with a half dozen Northern States. What does the Union League Club wish and expect to do in the premises? It proposes to set the machinery of the United States Department of Justice to work to punish violations of the Federal laws, and, if there are no laws that cover the case, to pass new ones. It also proposes that Congress shall reduce the representation of those States which exclude adult males from voting "except for participation in rebellion or other crimes." What will be the immediate and what the ultimate effect of an attempt by the Republican Party to carry out this policy? Unquestionably it will greatly aggravate and intensify race hatred in the South. At the same time, if Congress reduces representation, as proposed, not a single negro who cannot now vote will be enabled to do so. The only possible result would be that the South would have fewer votes in Congress and in the Electoral Colleges, and would cast those fewer votes with practically complete unity, as a section. We should have a still more "solid" South than we have now. We should have substantially the entire section voting en masse from an unpatriotic, narrow, demoralizing sentiment of race antipathy. We may say that this would be impossible in the South, but it would nevertheless be inevitable.

So far as the blacks are concerned, while they would gain no votes, they would incur deeper and more persistent prejudice than ever. They would become the objects of political resentment and the establishment of friendly and fair sentiment toward them, which is essential to their welfare, would be rendered almost impossible. They would be ruthlessly condemned by the action of their professed friends to difficulties and dangers for which they are themselves entirely irresponsible, and this without the gain of the slightest fraction of that political power and privilege which these friends claim should be conferred upon the race. If we examine the motives of the authors of this movement as they define them—with all sincerity, no doubt—and then trace the certain effect of the policy they advocate, we are lost in amazement at the absurd incongruity developed. We do not wish to be considered as justifying much of the feeling of the South in this matter. It has been extremely narrow and unenlightened. But the South has steadily approached a broader and more intelligent view. There has grown up among its people a class of men of affairs and of foresight who understand the need of a policy of justice toward the negroes and are striving to promote education, industry, thrift among them, with prosperity as the promised reward. The policy of the Union League would hinder, embarrass, and tend to defeat the efforts of this class. It would aid in putting the South as a section under the iron rule of the demagogues who can and will work race prejudice for their selfish interests. The infinite risks to the Nation in this we know from the history of Populism in the South. And for all this confusion, demoralization, and reaction there would be no compensation to any class, while to the negroes whose wrongs inspire the movement there could be only greater trouble, a harder lot.

Fortunately, as we believe, there is practically no chance that the movement will get far beyond the parlors of the Union League Club.

THE WILLIAMSBURG BRIDGE.

The incompleteness of the new bridge which is formally to be opened next week in spite of its incompleteness has perhaps been quite sufficiently insisted upon. Nobody will attend the opening ceremonies without ample notice that what he goes out to see is not a bridge with two roadways and half a dozen tracks complete and trolleys and steam cars running, and an ample promenade.

But it does not at all follow that the celebration should be deferred until all these things have been provided. A bridge is, essentially, a road over a river. Such a road there will be over the East River from the foot of Delancey Street by the end of next week, and it will justify the celebration. As the Mayor pertinently points out, it is as far advanced now as the first East River bridge was twenty years ago, when the opening of it was celebrated with exercises of which the most memorable and the best remembered is the address of ABRAM S. HEWITT. If the coming celebration produces anything as well worth remembering, it will be justified on its own account.

And there is a very good practical reason for not deferring the celebration. The relation of the bridge to the other means of interurban transit is a question which will attract more and sharply the attention of those concerned when the bridge is actually "open," no matter for how small a fraction of its ultimate usefulness. The earlier everybody entitled to a hearing upon any point connected with this question is heard, the better for the ultimate utility of the work. The curiosity and interest which the actual opening of the bridge will stimulate should be of great help to the authorities charged with developing to the utmost its practical uses.

THE EPIDEMIC AT BUTLER.

The conditions existing at Butler, Penn., as revealed by the appeal for a relief fund of $100,000 to aid in suppressing the epidemic of typhoid fever, are deplorable. The mortality has been large; more than 1,200 persons are now reported ill, suffering exists among the poor, and there is reason to fear that the epidemic has not reached its worst stage.

It is obvious, even without intimate knowledge of the facts, that this unhappy community is being devastated by secondary infection, and that by this agency the disease is being carried to neighboring communities, where it is appearing. This would warrant the conclusion that the outbreak has not been well handled. It is not well handled now if reports compiled for the Pittsburg papers can be trusted, and they seem to merit confidence. There are now at work in that field not less than five separate agencies of repression and relief, which are not in harmony, and consequently are not accomplishing as good results as would be secured by a single agency wisely directed. The Burgess, whose function corresponds with that of Mayor in the municipal organization, is collecting and disbursing relief funds in his official capacity. We also find the local Board of Health maintaining a futile activity, the State Board of Health, with a separate headquarters, doing the same; the Red Cross Society doing what it can in its own commendable way, the representatives of the Philadelphia relief movement, the representatives of the Pittsburg relief movement, and possibly other groups of unaffiliated and undirected workers largely wasting time and opportunity in duplicated effort, and, by reason of the fact that their respective fields of effort do not always touch at the edges, so to speak, failing to attain anything like thoroughness in dealing with local conditions and permitting many public dangers to escape detection and correction. Not in this way will Butler or any other community in like case be saved from practical extinction through secondary infection. If it needs $100,000 it should have it promptly, and to secure subscriptions to this or a much larger amount is the least difficult part of the task in hand. What it needs most is the services of an expert from outside, with skill and experience, who can coordinate the bodies now working at cross-purposes, cover the whole ground, bring order out of confusion, and use the money subscribed for relief and local sanitary reform to the best advantage. Without this a million dollars would not stop the spread of the epidemic and restore Butler to the condition of safe habitability. It is not so much money that is needed as good judgment in its employment for the ends in view. With this very much less than $100,000 would probably be ample.

To handle an epidemic which, through widespread secondary infection, has gained such headway as it has done at Butler, is a matter of great difficulty. To check it at the outset is much less difficult. Williamstown is a case in point. Typhoid fever broke out there and threatened Williams College as a similar outbreak at Ithaca threatened Cornell University. There were not over a dozen cases at Williams, but the outbreak had all the malevolent potentialities which reside in such occurrences. President HARPER did exactly the right thing, and did it at once. He secured the services of the accomplished expert who had represented the State Board of Health at Ithaca, took the measures called for without question or hesitation, and not one secondary case of typhoid has occurred in the town. Both Butler and Williamstown are object lessons, each in its own way—the one of how not to manage an outbreak of infectious disease and the other of how it should be managed. Those who contribute to the relief of Butler will be fully warranted in demanding that the situation be taken in hand by some one competent to deal with it, preferably an outsider without local interests and unhampered by social or other embarrassments; that the work of saving the town be done thoroughly, and that a satisfactory accounting be rendered in an exhaustive report which will crystallize the experience there gained for the information and protection of other communities.

RAISING THE GRADE OF GALVESTON.

The plan of raising the grade of the City of Galveston to conform to that established by the new sea wall is one of the curiosities of modern engineering. During the great inundation of 1900 the greater part of Galveston was submerged nearly sixteen feet, the tidal wave rising nearly sixteen feet above mean low-water level. The desirability of guarding against a like accident in future suggested the seawall seventeen feet above mean low water and this has been built. It soon became evident, however, that the existence of this impervious barrier between the city and the sea would become a very serious menace to life and property if a tidal wave should wash over it and be impounded by it, converting the site of the city into a lake by reason of the fact that the water which might come over the wall could not flow back into the sea. To prevent this it is now proposed to fill in and raise seventeen feet that portion of the city which was submerged in 1900. The area to be thus raised is approximately two square miles, and it will require something over 11,000,000 cubic yards of earth to do this. Buildings must be raised, pipes relaid, sewers rebuilt, and practically a new city built above the old one. The engineering problems are many and complex, but not impossible. That it is contemplated seriously and will probably be undertaken indicates a high degree of municipal enterprise in Galveston; and it is to be hoped that advantage will be taken of the opportunity to provide the city with adequate subways and pipe galleries. All the problems of a modern city should be considered carefully in connection with this unique opportunity to solve them satisfactorily and permanently.

Factory Girls and Shops.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

There is much force in the argument of Mrs. Watts in your paper of Nov. 24 that factory girls seem to be left entirely out of consideration in an effort such as the Consumers' League advocates to close the stores during the evenings before Christmas. Mrs. Watts asks how girls working from 7:30 A. M. to 6 P. M. can see and buy the pretty things if the stores are not open in the evening. But can this deprivation—after all an aesthetic deprivation, not a physical and social wrong—of a few weigh in the scale against the exhaustion and physical collapse of thousands of girls? No change is easy for all; must one not look on the greatest good for the greatest number?

The plan to close in the evenings is not actually prohibitive of purchases of factory girls. There is still the hour from 6 to 7 in many stores, and, although it may be rather hard for girls now and then to put off their supper and go in working clothes to do their shopping, could this weigh for a moment with them if they stopped seriously to consider the nervous tension, the crowding, the bad air endured all the day by girls behind the counters?

A POST OFFICE TRAGEDY.

Henry B. Warner in Baltimore News.

Listen to a tragic tale
Of a tramp's demise,
How a sad discovery
Took him by surprise.

In Post Office, Calvert Street,
Spied a man with grip
Sitting on the floor, awhile
Man filled order slip.

"Full o' money!" Tramp was sure,
As he well might be;
He had read the papers, and
One wise guy was he.

Slipped the grip and hit the beat
Out the first side door.
Opened up the treasure he

Counted out the money? No!
Let the truth be said;
Grip was full of sample soap—
Tramp dropped over, dead!

FEARS A GERMAN REVOLT

Baron von Kardorff Alarmed by Socialists' Growing Power.

Wants Something Done to Put a Stop to It—Reichstag Debate on Brutality in the Army.

BERLIN, Dec. 11.—In the course of a discussion on the maltreatment of private soldiers in the army in the Reichstag today Baron von Kardorff alluded to the enormous increase in the German Socialist vote. He said he would not desert that the army had grown untrustworthy, but he declared that its ranks were filled with Socialists, who were increasing in numbers with the growth of their party.

"My opinion," said Baron von Kardorff, "is that we are on an express train which is rolling with wind velocity into the socialized State of the future. At any rate, something must be done to prevent the growth of the Social Democracy, and the most effective means to this end would be to withdraw the suffrage for five years from Socialists who profess to be revolutionists or republicans."

This statement was greeted with Socialist laughter.

Continuing, the Baron said: "The Government must do everything in its power, for if nothing happens a revolution is coming with certainty."

The speaker pointed out that it would be impossible to suppress Socialism with intellectual weapons, and he urged Catholics and Protestants to conclude a truce in order that they might jointly combat this new danger. "It will then," said he, "be easy to lead a struggle against Socialism to a victorious end."

In the course of the debate War Minister von Einem entered earnestly into the charges of brutality against German army officers. He admitted that there had been abuses, and declared the army administration was determined to correct them as far as possible.

Nobody, he said, regretted the evils more than Emperor William, who never lost an opportunity to impress on the officials the seriousness of the offenses that had been brought to light.

Brutality in the army, said the Minister, was not wholly inexplicable. There was the bad private soldier as well as the bad Sergeant, and the bad private was largely responsible for the whole difficulty, "succeeding by the most devilish ingenuity in so embittering the non-commissioned officers that the latter finally vented their anger upon the weaklings."

This type of private, said the Minister, had always existed, and was more common under Social Democratic influence. The Social Democrats asserted that militarism enslaved, brutalized, and stupefied the people and suppressed freedom of thought. If this were true, Germany would be in a sad condition, since Germany was a universal military service country. But this was not true, as Germany had succeeded by an unparalleled combination of industry, intelligence, and energy in conquering a large part of the markets of the world.

During the year ending in June, the War Minister continued, fifty officers and 577 non-commissioned officers and good service men were punished for maltreatment of privates. Reckoning percentages, one officer in 400 and one non-commissioned officer in 120 had been found guilty of the misuse of authority. The convictions were really fewer during the recent agitation than in some other years. However, the army administration had determined to stop mistreatment altogether. Even 100 cases a year would be intolerable.

Herr Richter (Socialist) said what incensed him to the highest degree was that a single non-commissioned officer could commit twelve hundred instances of maltreatment, and that, too, in the Garde-du-Corps. If such a thing were possible in the guards, who were often under the Emperor's eyes, to what extent, asked the speaker, must this system of mal treatment be carried on in troops of the line in remote regions?

JAPANESE DIET DISSOLVED.

Lower House Refused to Withdraw Attack on Ministry—Russia's Reply to Japan's Demands.

TOKIO, Dec. 11.—The Diet has been dissolved. Hopes had been entertained in official circles that in view of the extraordinary nature of the step taken by the lower house yesterday in its reply to the speech from the throne the vote on the reply would be reversed to-day.

The allied parties, however, at meetings held outside the Diet, decided that the action taken should not be reversed, and the dissolution followed.

It is now reported in official circles that the reply of the Russian Government to the Japanese demands is on its way here, and it is forecasted that the final proposals of Japan will prove to be considerable modifications of the claims made in the last previous note.

It is also said that Russia has made considerable concessions regarding the difficulties in Manchuria.

CHINA IS LOSING HOPE.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES Special Cablegram.

LONDON, Dec. 12.—The Peking correspondent of The Times says another telegram from St. Petersburg circulated in the Chinese capital yesterday announces that Russia accepts the Japanese demands regarding Korea with certain modifications. The question of the evacuation of Manchuria is to be left in abeyance.

It is indisputable, says the correspondent, that the repetition of such messages, coupled with the long delay, is having a tendency to shake China's confidence in Japan and to influence the Chinese to consider more favorably the Russian demands in regard to Manchuria.

By The Associated Press.

PEKING, Dec. 11.—Prince Ching informed the foreign Ministers to-day that he was not negotiating with Russia, and that the Government was merely awaiting events.

It is known, however, that Lien-Fang, First Secretary of the Board of Foreign Affairs, who represented the Foreign Office during former negotiations, is paying frequent visits to the Russian Minister, M. Lessar.

CHAMBERLAIN'S VIEWS IN 1895.

Sir W. Vernon Harcourt Quotes from a Speech Delivered That Year by the ex-Colonial Secretary.

LONDON, Dec. 11.—Sir William Vernon Harcourt, speaking to his constituents at Tredegar to-night, drew a parallel between a speech delivered in Birmingham in 1895 by Mr. Chamberlain and the present policy of the ex-Colonial Secretary. In 1895 said Sir William, Mr. Chamberlain spoke as follows:

"It is improbable that the working classes of this country will ever again submit to the sufferings and misery inflicted by the Corn Laws. If this is the policy of the Tories we have only to recall the history of the times when protection stared the poor and the country was brought to the brink of revolution."

Sir William said he would "leave Mr. Chamberlain with his present and historical consciousness" and discuss that gentleman's immediate policy. He did not think it was worth while to take up time with Mr. Balfour's plan. The Government at this time was nothing that could really be called a Government. It was, Sir William said, "only a derelict wreck of fortuitous atoms which has lost its best officers and is being washed about by waves over which it has no control."

The speaker pilloried Mr. Chamberlain's statements concerning his policy and predicted that the result of the adoption of this policy would be ruinous to the poorer classes and would end in tying the hands of Finance Ministers in the future.

WANTS A DRAMATIC FINALE FOR THE DREYFUS AFFAIR.

Anatole France Does Not Wish It to End Like a "Bourgeois Comedy"—Desires Another Court-Martial.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES Special Cablegram.

LONDON, Dec. 12.—An article in the Aurore by Anatole France on the question whether Dreyfus ought again to be tried by a court-martial is quoted by the Paris correspondent of The Times. M. France says:

"By instinct I am inclined to favor another court-martial. It is not desirable that this affair, of the true Shakespearian dramatic type, should end as a bourgeois comedy. I have not any personal interest at stake, but the interest of society.

"Courts-martial judge and sentence every day a number of French common soldiers. Like the latter, Dreyfus is amenable to a court-martial. To spare him would be to evade the reality and end this Shakespearean drama, as I just said, like a bourgeois comedy.

"A final verdict must be given by a court-martial in order that a social lesson may be learned.

"As to courts-martial themselves, no further evidence is required to show that they constitute bad administration of justice. Military men themselves know it. One of my officer friends told me how he proceeded when he was presiding over one of these tribunals. The accused was brought before him. When the case had been stated my friend remarked: 'A bad case. This is very bad.' Repeating this several times, he intimidated the accused and easily persuaded him to consent to the minimum penalty."

Notwithstanding his judgment of courts-martial as travesties of justice, M. France thinks it necessary that Dreyfus be acquitted by such a court before there can be a final settlement of his case.

SANDRINGHAM FIRE HEROINE.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Dec. 11.—The Hon. Charlotte Knollys, whose bravery saved Queen Alexandra's life in the fire at Sandringham yesterday morning, has been associated with the Court since the early days of King Edward's married life. She is a sister of Lord Knollys, the King's private secretary.

Miss Knollys is private secretary and a Lady of the Bedchamber to the Queen. Warm friendship exists between her Majesty and Miss Knollys.

THE GERMAN ART QUARREL.

New Proposition with a View to Ending It and Securing a Representative Exhibit at St. Louis.

BERLIN, Dec. 11.—A proposition is under consideration for the settlement of the dispute between the warring art factions, so that a united German art exhibit at St. Louis may be possible.

The Imperial Commissioner, Herr Lewald, originally formed a non-partisan committee to select exhibits, regardless of membership in any association. The academic organizations, which enjoy imperial favor, upset the arrangement by procuring a decision that the exhibit be placed under their management. Thereupon the impressionists, who include many of the leading artists of the country, though their associations have comparatively small membership, refused to participate.

It is now proposed that the Chancellor form a new commission, including none but the greatest names, regardless of the question whether they represent one association or tendency or another.

It is believed that only such interference can prevent the exhibit from being partial and one-sided.

EXONERATE CONSUL DAVIS.

Official Advices Regarding the Alexandretta Affair Say He Only Used His Cane in Self-Defense.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 11.—The United States Legation's latest advices regarding the Alexandretta affair confirm the reports of the violence of the police and the attack on Consul Davis, who only used his cane in self-defense.

It appears that Attarian, the naturalized American who had asked for the Consul's assistance in order to enable him to embark for Egypt, was arrested as a subterfuge.

After he had embarked on the consular boat with Mr. Davis, Attarian was invited to land in order to undergo fumigation, whereupon the man was suddenly seized by three policemen and promptly locked up. Mr. Davis, in attempting to interpose, was assaulted by the police and was obliged to defend himself with his cane.

Attarian is still a prisoner.

The report that the United States cruiser San Francisco left Beirut for Alexandretta was premature.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11.—Chekib Bey, the Turkish Minister, to-day filed with the State Department an explanation from the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Alexandretta affair. It states in effect that Consul Davis sought to procure the illegal emigration of a Turkish subject, and, failing in this, attacked and beat the Turkish police and then took the steamer.

The State Department has had partial advices from Minister Leishman and is awaiting the completion of his investigation.

Mrs. Schenley's English Estate.

LONDON, Dec. 11.—Justice Bucknill to-day granted probate for the English will of Mrs. Mary E. Schenley, the benefactress of Pittsburg, Penn., who died at her home here in November. This document deals solely with the property in England. The American will, of which Andrew Carnegie is trustee, deals exclusively with Mrs. Schenley's property in the United States. It is understood that the value of the English estate is about $5,000,000.

Kaiser Receives Herr Ballin.

BERLIN, Dec. 11.—Emperor William received Herr Ballin, Director General of the Hamburg-American Steamship Line, to-day and heard his account of the general situation in regard to steamship competition and the prospective agreements with other lines for securing favorable traffic

BETTER CITY GOVERNMENT

Civil Service Reform League Hears Plans at Final Session.

Municipalities Said to be in the Hands of Practical Political Organizations.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 11.—The twenty-third annual convention of the National Civil Service Reform League concluded to-night with a banquet at the Lyric Music Hall. Charles J. Bonaparte presided, and Robert Adams, Jr., made an address on "Consular Reform." Other speakers were Wayne MacVeagh, John R. Proctor, and Eugene F. Ware. Dr. Daniel C. Gilman was re-elected President, and the following Vice Presidents were named:

Charles Francis Adams, Joseph H. Choate, Grover Cleveland, Charles W. Eliot, Hayes A. Garfield, Arthur T. Hadley, Henry Charles Lea, Seth Low, Franklin MacVeagh, George A. Pope, Bishop Henry C. Potter, and Archbishop P. J. Ryan.

At the day sessions, held at Johns Hopkins University, a paper was read by Charles Richardson, in which he said that a modern city under the spoils system was like a rich treasure ship with pirates on board. Prof. W. W. Willoughby of Johns Hopkins, Elliott H. Goodwin of New York, and Richard Henry Dana also made addresses. At the evening session Commissioner of Charities Homer Folks of New York read a paper on "Some Phases of the Practical Operation of the Civil Service Laws."

Mr. Richardson, advocating the merit system, said, in part:

"Modern cities are like richly laden treasure ships in an ocean swarming with pirates. The plunder that can now be obtained by gaining the control of a State or City Government is so enormous that wherever there is a chance to capture it the effort is sure to be made, and, being made for wicked and dishonest purposes, the men who make it and the means they use will be of a corresponding character.

"In many cases shrewd and unscrupulous leaders, assuming the cloak of civic patriotism, and acting as managers of party organizations, have succeeded in combining and molding the worst elements into disciplined bands of reckless mercenaries, which they use for controlling primaries and carrying elections.

"By distributing offices, franchises, contracts, and special privileges among their followers, these lords of misrule have converted public powers and public revenues into huge bribery funds, or rewards for betraying public interests, and defeating or partisaning the political efforts of great communities."

He advocated a greater use of the newspapers for bringing civil service reform home to the public.

Mr. Dana, on the same subject, said:

"The competitive system of appointments, as applied to municipalities in the United States, stops short of the higher officers. Exempting the latter from the merit plan was perhaps well in the tentative stages of the reform, but it is vastly more important for administrative purposes to have the reform extended to these higher places than to apply it to the lower.

"But can such positions as that of city engineer, city electrician, Superintendent of Roads, city physician, city chemist, &c., be safely filled by competitive examinations? Surely they can. The examination for the position of city engineer, for example, can be limited to graduates of established character from well-known technical or scientific schools, who have had a given number of years, at least, of experience, and the questions may be practical ones, testing the knowledge and experience in all the subjects and engineering problems which an engineer of a large municipality should have.

"The examination for scientific positions in the United States service have been some of the most satisfactory of the competitive tests. Latent talent has been discovered, and the best men come to the top. In the National service of Great Britain all the permanent heads of departments, except Cabinet offices, are under the merit system."

Prof. Willoughby, on "Civil Service Reform in Maryland," said:

"During the last few years it should be said that the demerits of the spoils system have continued to be manifested in those branches of the public service not yet removed by law from its operation. Many of the appointments both of the present Governor and of the Mayor of Baltimore, whose term of office has recently expired, have been excellent, but in not a few instances, especially in the case of minor appointments, party loyalty and service have been permitted to screen notoriously unsavory and even criminal records."

Mr. Goodwin asked: "Can the methods of examination employed in selecting carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service be applied to the appointment of fourth-class Postmasters?" He said:

"It is a reflection on the intelligence of the people to suppose for an instant that they would not welcome the adoption of any practical plan which would place the appointment and removal of Postmasters on a strictly business basis. They are subjected to too great personal annoyance by the sudden substitution of an inexperienced for an experienced Postmaster, and a change in the location of the Post Office itself, to wish to continue a system—even though they have become accustomed to it—which involves delay, if nothing more serious, in the handling of matters of daily concern to them. Due weight must be given to local prejudice and the desire for 'home rule.'"

Cornell Students Gain Over Last Year.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., Dec. 11.—The Cornell University register issued to-night shows that the total registration this year is 3,014 as against 2,968 at this time last year, a gain of forty-five students. Last year the registration was 170 larger than the preceding year. The falling off in the increase is due to the closing of the State College of Forestry by Gov. Odell and to the effects of the typhoid fever epidemic. The loss of the Forestry College cost Cornell seventy students.

SAYS MR. FAIR DIED FIRST.

Evidence of French Doctor Who Examined the Bodies of C. L. Fair and His Wife.

PARIS, Dec. 11.—Dr. Perriquet, considered to be the leading witness in the Fair will case, testified to-day before Commissioner Risley of New York.

He said he arrived on the scene an hour after the automobile accident and found both Charles L. Fair and his wife dead. The body of Mr. Fair was already rigid, but that of his wife was not rigid, indicating that the former died first. From the condition of Mr. Fair's body the witness believed death was instantaneous. The condition of Mrs. Fair's body indicated that her death was not instantaneous.

Dr. Perriquet recited the case of a woman who was murdered near the scene of the accident. Her wounds, which were in the head, were almost identical with those of Mrs. Fair, but she lived many hours. The witness further testified that while he was unable to swear positively if Mr. Fair died first, yet his positive opinion was that Mrs. Fair must have survived her husband.

The court has received a letter from M. Lescour, an official of the local Mayor's office, near the scene of the accident, saying that the peasant wife who found the bodies told him she saw Mrs. Fair's hand move after Mr. Fair was dead.

The examination of Dr. Perriquet will take place on Monday.

Brazilian Revolutionary Movement.

RIO JANEIRO, Dec. 11.—The Chamber of Deputies has rejected an amendment to the budget bill authorizing the Government to reduce the salaries of civil officers and employes.

"TOSCA" DRAWS A CROWD

Mme. Ternina as the Heroine Pleases the Audience.

Messrs. Caruso and Scotti Also in Good Voice—Concert by People's Symphony Auxiliary Club.

The remarkably fine performance of "Tosca" that is to be seen at the Metropolitan Opera House this season attracted a numerous audience last evening at its third repetition. The cast was the same as at the previous representations. Mme. Ternina was in better voice than she has been at any time since her reappearance, which was noted by all her admirers with heartfelt satisfaction. She put all the tremendous intensity into her representation of the heroine's character that makes it one of the most remarkable pieces of operatic acting to be seen anywhere to-day.

There is much to admire in Mr. Caruso's performance, especially in the second and third acts; in the scene after his torture he is convincing in its showing of indomitable spirit and flaming hatred in a body crushed and weakened, and in his final air in the last act he rises to superb eloquence. He again committed the impropriety of repeating it. He does not, however, suppress the desire on the part of the spectators that he would present himself in a somewhat more distinguished or at least sympathetic appearance, and in a costume that would accentuate less his deficiencies of figure. Mr. Scotti's Scarpia never fails in its aristocratic and cynical effectiveness. Mr. Vigna's conducting was as energetic as ever.

POPULAR CHAMBER MUSIC.

The second concert of the People's Symphony Auxiliary Club, given last evening at the Cooper Union Hall, was an admirable example of what such a concert should be. It was interesting as offering one of the first public appearances in New York of a string quartet of promise and, as they showed last evening, already of excellent accomplishment; it is led by Miss Olive Mead, and is composed, besides her, of the Misses Elizabeth Haughton, Miss Gladys North, and Miss Lillian Littlehales. They gave a smooth and carefully studied performance of Beethoven's string quartet, Op. 18, No. 5, in which there was fine quality of tone, especially on the part of the first violin, and pure intonation. Such playing of such chamber compositions is what will present this class of music to the Cooper Union audiences in the way to win them to love and admiration. The authorities of the enterprise ought to see to it that the level reached at this second concert is maintained.

The programme also included a group of piano solos by Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, Richard Strauss's 'cello sonata, played by Miss Littlehales and Miss Heyman, and three songs sung by Mr. Jarnowski, baritone. There was an audience large considering the class of music it was asked to listen to—an audience that ought to be increased, if the standard is kept where it should be kept. Mr. Arens, as usual, gave brief analytical explanations of the music before it was played.

NOTES OF THE STAGE.

Prove that the National Art Theatre will be a paying 5 per cent. investment and then you can get an Andrew Carnegie or a John D. Rockefeller to put up all the money necessary, is what Mrs. Martha McCulloch-Williams, the author and story writer, told the Woman's Auxiliary of the National Art Theatre Society yesterday afternoon in Tuxedo Hall.

"There is another thing we should insist on," said Mrs. Williams. "If we ever get the theatre, let us have no 'serial' authors who turn out a play every morning before breakfast. We don't want to rely on people like Clyde Fitch and Cyrus Townsend Brady, who can work four typewriters at once, one with each hand and one with each foot."

Mrs. Williams's remarks were received with enthusiasm by the 200 women present.

Mrs. Nye announced that it was the plan of Miss Elizabeth Marbury, Miss Jeannette Gilder and others to build a memorial to Harriet Hubbard Ayer, and asked the society to help this movement as much as possible.

***

Guy Bates Post, recently identified with "Soldiers of Fortune," has been engaged by Kirke La Shelle to play the part of Steve in his forthcoming production of "The Virginian." The play will open at the Manhattan Theatre Jan. 4. Mattie Earle has been engaged for the principal comedy role.

Mr. Damrosch's Lecture.

The second of Mr. Walter Damrosch's lecture recitals on the all-engrossing subject of "Parsifal" was given yesterday afternoon in the new Lyceum Theatre to the great admiration of a very large number of ladies who paid the closest attention. Mr. Damrosch devoted the afternoon to the second and third acts of the music drama which he explained, recited, and played.

NAT C. GOODWIN INJURED.

Severs Small Artery by Being Thrown Against Girder of Brooklyn Bridge When Automobile Broke Down.

Nat C. Goodwin, the comedian, who is playing the character of Bottom in a "Midsummer Night's Dream," at the Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn, was thrown from his electric brougham while crossing the Brooklyn Bridge last night, and was so severely injured that it was thought he would not be able to go on with his part, and his understudy, Edmund D. Lyons, prepared to take his place. Mr. Goodwin, however, after being attended by Ambulance Surgeon Wilms of the Cumberland Street Hospital, insisted on going to the theatre and proceeding with his part. A large audience was kept waiting fully an hour by the accident.

FILE PLANS FOR MUSIC HALL.

To be Erected on Forty-eighth Street, Near Broadway.

The Realty Amusement Company, of which Morris H. Hayman is President, filed plans at the Building Department yesterday for a new music hall, to be erected on the north side of Forty-eighth Street, just east of Broadway. The place is to be known as "Lederer's"—not Lederer's Theatre or Music Hall, it is explained, but just plain Lederer's.

Work on the new structure will be begun immediately, and, owing to the fact that the structural materials are all ready for delivery, Mr. Hayman said yesterday that the building will be completed by February 1.

The side walls of the building now occupied by the place will be used, but aside from the exterior walls the auditorium will be an entirely new structure. The plans, prepared by Messrs. Cornish, Thomas, Rouse & Cornish, architects, provide for practically all the large trade sales of woolens, cottons, and flannels in the city.

Mr. Wilmerding was President of the Essex County Country Club and a member of the Union and Merchants' Clubs of this city.

He is survived by a widow, two sons, John C. Wilmerding, Jr., and E. Coster Wilmerding, and a daughter, Mrs. Wilmerding is a sister of John G. Heckscher, Mrs. Stephen Van Rensselaer, and Mrs. De Saulles of Bethlehem, Penn., and an aunt of Mrs. George B. McClellan.

"TOSCA" DRAWS A CROWD

Mme. Ternina as the Heroine Pleases the Audience.

The remarkably fine performance of "Tosca" that is to be seen at the Metropolitan Opera House this season attracted a numerous audience last evening at its third repetition. The cast was the same as at the previous representations. Mme. Ternina was in better voice than she has been at any time since her reappearance, which was noted by all her admirers with heartfelt satisfaction. She put all the tremendous intensity into her representation of the heroine's character that makes it one of the most remarkable pieces of operatic acting to be seen anywhere to-day.

There is much to admire in Mr. Caruso's performance, especially in the second and third acts; in the scene after his torture he is convincing in its showing of indomitable spirit and flaming hatred in a body crushed and weakened, and in his final air in the last act he rises to superb eloquence. He again committed the impropriety of repeating it. He does not, however, suppress the desire on the part of the spectators that he would present himself in a somewhat more distinguished or at least sympathetic appearance, and in a costume that would accentuate less his deficiencies of figure. Mr. Scotti's Scarpia never fails in its aristocratic and cynical effectiveness. Mr. Vigna's conducting was as energetic as ever.

POPULAR CHAMBER MUSIC.

The second concert of the People's Symphony Auxiliary Club, given last evening at the Cooper Union Hall, was an admirable example of what such a concert should be. It was interesting as offering one of the first public appearances in New York of a string quartet of promise and, as they showed last evening, already of excellent accomplishment; it is led by Miss Olive Mead, and is composed, besides her, of the Misses Elizabeth Haughton, Miss Gladys North, and Miss Lillian Littlehales. They gave a smooth and carefully studied performance of Beethoven's string quartet, Op. 18, No. 5, in which there was fine quality of tone, especially on the part of the first violin, and pure intonation. Such playing of such chamber compositions is what will present this class of music to the Cooper Union audiences in the way to win them to love and admiration. The authorities of the enterprise ought to see to it that the level reached at this second concert is maintained.

The programme also included a group of piano solos by Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, Richard Strauss's 'cello sonata, played by Miss Littlehales and Miss Heyman, and three songs sung by Mr. Jarnowski, baritone. There was an audience large considering the class of music it was asked to listen to—an audience that ought to be increased, if the standard is kept where it should be kept. Mr. Arens, as usual, gave brief analytical explanations of the music before it was played.

NOTES OF THE STAGE.

Prove that the National Art Theatre will be a paying 5 per cent. investment and then you can get an Andrew Carnegie or a John D. Rockefeller to put up all the money necessary, is what Mrs. Martha McCulloch-Williams, the author and story writer, told the Woman's Auxiliary of the National Art Theatre Society yesterday afternoon in Tuxedo Hall.

"There is another thing we should insist on," said Mrs. Williams. "If we ever get the theatre, let us have no 'serial' authors who turn out a play every morning before breakfast. We don't want to rely on people like Clyde Fitch and Cyrus Townsend Brady, who can work four typewriters at once, one with each hand and one with each foot."

Mrs. Williams's remarks were received with enthusiasm by the 200 women present.

Mrs. Nye announced that it was the plan of Miss Elizabeth Marbury, Miss Jeannette Gilder and others to build a memorial to Harriet Hubbard Ayer, and asked the society to help this movement as much as possible.

***

Guy Bates Post, recently identified with "Soldiers of Fortune," has been engaged by Kirke La Shelle to play the part of Steve in his forthcoming production of "The Virginian." The play will open at the Manhattan Theatre Jan. 4. Mattie Earle has been engaged for the principal comedy role.

Mr. Damrosch's Lecture.

The second of Mr. Walter Damrosch's lecture recitals on the all-engrossing subject of "Parsifal" was given yesterday afternoon in the new Lyceum Theatre to the great admiration of a very large number of ladies who paid the closest attention. Mr. Damrosch devoted the afternoon to the second and third acts of the music drama which he explained, recited, and played.

NAT C. GOODWIN INJURED.

Severs Small Artery by Being Thrown Against Girder of Brooklyn Bridge When Automobile Broke Down.

Nat C. Goodwin, the comedian, who is playing the character of Bottom in a "Midsummer Night's Dream," at the Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn, was thrown from his electric brougham while crossing the Brooklyn Bridge last night, and was so severely injured that it was thought he would not be able to go on with his part, and his understudy, Edmund D. Lyons, prepared to take his place. Mr. Goodwin, however, after being attended by Ambulance Surgeon Wilms of the Cumberland Street Hospital, insisted on going to the theatre and proceeding with his part. A large audience was kept waiting fully an hour by the accident.

FILE PLANS FOR MUSIC HALL.

To be Erected on Forty-eighth Street, Near Broadway.

The Realty Amusement Company, of which Morris H. Hayman is President, filed plans at the Building Department yesterday for a new music hall, to be erected on the north side of Forty-eighth Street, just east of Broadway. The place is to be known as "Lederer's"—not Lederer's Theatre or Music Hall, it is explained, but just plain Lederer's.

Work on the new structure will be begun immediately, and, owing to the fact that the structural materials are all ready for delivery, Mr. Hayman said yesterday that the building will be completed by February 1.

The side walls of the building now occupied by the place will be used, but aside from the exterior walls the auditorium will be an entirely new structure. The plans, prepared by Messrs. Cornish, Thomas, Rouse & Cornish, architects, provide for

NANCE O'NEIL AS A "TRILBY."

McKee Rankin's Influence Over Her as Described by Manager Cleveland.

CHICAGO, Dec. 11.—The troubles of Nance O'Neil, McKee Rankin, and W. S. Cleveland, the theatrical manager, who has attached all the property of the two actors, were aired in the Justice Court here to-day.

Mr. Cleveland in his testimony declared that Miss O'Neil was hypnotized by Rankin. "It is a second case of Trilby and Svengali," said he. "From the stage of my theatre I have seen Rankin exert his influence over Miss O'Neil. When he looked at her she forgot her lines, and when he snapped his fingers at her she would act. He has an undue influence over her, and has kept her segregated from other actors or managers."

When Miss O'Neil was put on the stand she denied the allegation of Mr. Cleveland that Rankin had any hypnotic powers over her.

The case, which involves the recovery of advance expenses which Cleveland claims to have furnished Miss O'Neil and Rankin, was continued until Dec. 14.

SAYS MR. BRYAN USED DECEIT.

Mrs. Philo S. Bennett, Appealing from Probate Court Will Decision, Charges Undue Influence.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Dec. 11.—Counsel for Mrs. Bennett, widow of Philo S. Bennett, to-day filed a long statement of the reasons for the appeal recently taken from the decision of Judge Cleaveland in the Probate Court in relation to Mr. Bennett's will. In the formal notice of appeal it was announced that objection would be taken to all of the bequests in the will providing for trust funds for educational purposes to be administered by Mr. and Mrs. William J. Bryan, and also to the appointment of Mr. Bryan as executor and trustee.

The document filed to-day, after repeating the clauses of the will to which objection is taken, says in effect that Mr. and Mrs. Bryan "induced and persuaded" Mr. Bennett to sign a paper addressed to William J. Bryan and to copy a considerable part of another paper, the said copy to be addressed to Mrs. Bennett. The papers referred to are the sealed letter by which Mr. Bryan and his family were to be given $50,000 by consent of Mrs. Bennett, and a letter similar in purport which Mr. Bryan produced in court.

It is declared that the sealed letter addressed to Mrs. Bennett "misstates and is misleading in that Mr. Bennett did not then own, nor at any time thereafter did he own the Bridgeport houses referred to," and Mrs. Bennett will not receive under the document probated as the will of Mr. Bennett the amount that Mr. Bennett intended she should have.

The document continues: "The writing addressed to this appellant, the wife of Mr. Bennett, did not state the real and true arrangement which Mr. and Mrs. Bryan had induced Mr. Bennett to enter into with them. The fact that the children of Mr. and Mrs. Bryan are to receive $15,000 of Mr. Bennett's money was not stated, but on the contrary the writing addressed to the widow expressly stated that if William J. Bryan for any reason is unwilling to receive that sum for himself, that he shall distribute the $50,000 among educational and charitable institutions, while in truth and fact and in law the letter addressed to Mr. Bryan constituted him a trustee for his wife and children; and the sum of $25,000, if received by Mr. Bryan would belong to his wife and children, all of which Mr. Bryan and his wife well knew."

EXPLOSION IMPERILS MANY.

One Hundred Girls Rescued from Pittsburg Fire—One Man Missing.

PITTSBURG, Dec. 11.—Seven persons were seriously burned and many others sustained slight injuries to-day in a fire and explosion at Armstrong's cork factory on Twenty-third Street.

Robert Hanlin is missing. He is supposed to be buried in the ruins.

The fire started in the grinding room on the second floor and gained such headway that many of the six hundred employes barely escaped from the building with their lives.

Over 100 girls were carried by the police and firemen from the second floor, by means of ladders.

The explosion was due to a motor and boiler and partly wrecked the building, which was a small structure adjoining the larger buildings. The total loss is $40,000.

BIG VERDICT AT CHICAGO.

Court Awards $896,670 for Land Valued by Railroads at $5,000,000.

CHICAGO, Dec. 11.—A verdict for $896,670 compensation was returned by a jury in Judge Smith's court to-day in the condemnation suit begun by the sanitary district to obtain possession of land lying along the west bank of the Chicago River, between Madison and Van Buren Streets. After the verdict had been rendered, counsel for the Pennsylvania Company and the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway Company, the principal defendants in the case, made a motion for a new trial, which will be argued in a few weeks.

The verdict is considered a victory for the sanitary district, as the defendant railroads declared that they would be damaged to the extent of at least $5,000,000 by the condemnation of the land. The jury took fifteen hours to reach a verdict.

GUNBOAT CASTINE GOES AGROUND

Tug from League Navy Yard Assists Boat to Deep Water.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 11.—The United States gunboat Castine, which left the League Island Navy Yard yesterday for Key West, was aground in the Delaware River near Marcus Hook, between the high tides to-day.

The Castine dropped anchor last night near the Marcus Hook Bar, fifteen miles below this city, and after raising her anchor this morning she went on the bar while turning to go down stream.

Finding her engines unable to draw her bow off the sandy bottom, Commander A. M. Knight sent word to the navy yard for aid. The Government tug Samoset was sent to the gunboat's assistance.

At high tide this afternoon the tug, with the aid of the Castine's engines, floated the little warship. The Castine anchored for a short time, and at 6 o'clock proceeded down the river. She is apparently uninjured.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON.

SUBJECT.—The Queen of Sheba Visits Solomon. Kings, x., 1-10.

An incident somewhat similar to that now brought before us occurred in comparatively very recent times. It was when an African Prince was sent on an embassy to Queen Victoria. When he reached her Court he was filled with as much astonishment at what he saw as was the Queen of Sheba when she visited Solomon. But the cause of all the prosperity, intelligence, and comfort seen on every side he could not understand. So he asked the Queen for a solution of the mystery. Laying her hand upon the Bible, she replied: "This is the secret of England's greatness." The Queen of Sheba must likewise have returned to her home impressed with the same great truth—that it was a knowledge of the will of God, and obedience to it, that explained all that she had seen. She had heard of it before she came, but when she came into personal contact with him who had built "The Temple" she said, "Behold, the half was not told me." (v. 7.)

The incident of her visit may be studied from various standpoints. We may view it as showing the relation of wealth and prosperity to the blessings of God; or, as showing the earnestness of the heathen world and its need of instruction, or as setting forth the great contrast between earth's wealth and power and its ignorance and hunger; or, as our Lord applied it when He said: "The Queen of the South will rise up in judgment with this generation and shall condemn it, for she came from the uppermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and behold, a greater than Solomon is here." (Matt. xii., 42.)

The line of thought which we have followed in studying the history of Solomon, however—while it incidentally and inferentially touches upon all of these points—will bring before us more especially the personal position and influence of one who is "built up a spiritual house"—one in whom God dwells as manifestly as He did in "The Temple" of Solomon. For it was "when the Queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the Lord, she came to prove him with hard questions." (Verse 1)—questions which no one else could satisfy.

UPBUILDING OF THE BELIEVER.

Considering the incident in this light, this lesson grows logically out of that of last week. Then we saw what a magnificent and joyous thing it was to be dedicated as a temple of the living God—to be one in whom He dwells and with whom He walks. Now we see how such a character is to affect others. For the importance of the upbuilding of the believer—his spiritual growth—is not limited to himself. He is not the only one—or even the principal one—to be benefited by such a growth. It is, in fact, not a very important matter in itself, and by itself, that any particular man should become "a temple of the Holy Ghost." It is, to be sure, a great privilege and a wonderful exhibition of Divine grace, to be such a temple—all the greater and more wonderful because each one in himself is of so little worth. He is only one of many millions, and why should God bestow upon him such loving kindness?

St. Paul himself could not understand it at all unless it was that in him "first, Jesus Christ might show forth all long suffering for a pattern" to others. (I. Tim., i., 16.) He declared it to be the great problem of his life to ascertain why he was called out of darkness, when he said—"I press on, if so be that I may apprehend that for which also I was apprehended by Christ Jesus." (Phil., iii., 12.) And he never came so near to solving the question as when he realized that his very living was "needful" only for the sake of others. (Phil., i., 23-25.) So it is with every one.

For the Scriptures plainly declare that God places his children in a world that is forgetful of Him—and keeps them in it—simply that the world may be blessed, and brought to a knowledge of Him. The beautiful parable of "The Wheat and the Tares"—the story of Abraham's intercession for the cities of the plain—the history of David in the army of Saul, the building of "The Temple" by Solomon—and many other incidents—show very clearly how God blesses the world because of the presence in it of His own dear children. For the sake of "the Wheat"—"His Wheat," (Matt., iii., 12)—which He will gather "into His garner," (Luke, iii., 17)—"the Tares" are not uprooted. For the sake of "ten righteous," the whole city of the wicked would have been spared. For the sake of David, Saul's army was victorious. For the sake of Solomon, that he might build "The Temple," all Israel was blessed with peace and prosperity.

But this is not the only direction in which the presence of the child of God is to be seen and felt. He is not to be simply a negative force to prevent evil, but he is to be a positive force to do good among men and to glorify God. All men are now somewhat familiar with an instrument called a dynamo. In its essential nature it is simply a piece of soft iron properly wound with insulated wire, and made to revolve between the two poles of a magnet. This body of soft iron thus does nothing but move continually in the presence of that which has power in itself, but in so doing it becomes a power to give light and heat to a whole city, and to move the wheels of countless industries.

Something like this is the position of the child of God in the world. Having received grace from Christ, he is to minister grace for Christ. He is to be in his measure—"the light of the world, a city that is set on an hill," and "cannot be hid." (Matt., v., 14.) With such a position and such a work, who can estimate the value of every individual believer? His very presence, like the oxygen in the air, should give life and strength. But if he does not daily receive grace by a close walk with God—like the soft iron when it ceases to revolve between the poles of the magnet—his power will be gone. So it was with Solomon. His position, and that of "Temple" which he built, could be maintained for good only as long as he cleaved to God himself. (ix., 1-9.)

ZENITH OF HIS GLORY.

When he was in the prime of his manhood, and in the zenith of his glory, the Queen of Sheba came to him. She "lived a thousand miles distant, on the Red Sea. Sheba is a country of Arabia Felix. It is the Yemen, or Sabean country of Arabia, and famous for perfumes. It also abounded in silver and gold. As there is a Sheba among the sons of Cush, (Gen. x., 7,) and another Sheba among the sons of Joktan, (Gen., x., 28,) a doubt has arisen whether the 'Queen of Sheba' was an Ethiopian or an Arabian Princess. The expression 'Queen of the South,' which is applied to her by our Lord (Matt., xii., 42) would suit equally well either country. And both countries profess to have traditions on the subject connecting the Queen of Sheba with their history. In both countries, too, curiously enough, government by Queens was common. Still, there is little difficulty here in deciding between the rival claims, since those of Arabia decidedly preponderate.

"The Arabian Sheba was the great spice country of the ancient world, whereas Ethiopia furnishes no spices. The Arabian Sheba was an important kingdom. Sheba in Ethiopia was a mere town, subject to Meroe. If Ophir be placed in Arabia there will be an additional reason for regarding Sheba as in the same quarter, since then Solomon's trade with that place will account for his fame having reached the Sabean Queen." (Canon Rawlinson.)

As regards the purpose of the visit of the Queen of Sheba, Geikie says: "Legend has been busy with an account of the tests with which the Queen tried the wisdom of Solomon. She had dressed—we are told—five hundred boys as girls, and five hundred girls as boys, and collected one thousand carpets of gold and silver tissue, a crown adorned with pearls and diamonds and a great quantity of perfumes. All these were sent to Jerusalem, and with them a single pearl, a diamond cut through in strings and a goblet in a box. Her envoy brought also a letter to Solomon, which intimated that if he were really a prophet, he would tell which were boys and which girls in the train of her ambassadors, what the contents of the box, pierce the pearl, thread the diamond and fill the goblet with water which came neither from earth nor heaven.

"The King told the contents of the letter was true information, but there was yet distinguished the boys from the girls as they washed their hands, the boys simply dipping their hands in the water, the girls tucking up their sleeves to their shoulders and washing their arms as well. By the help of a magic stone, he drilled a hole through the pearl at once, and he threaded the diamond by making a worm pass through it with a fine thread in its mouth. The crystal goblet he filled with water gathered from the sweat of a wild horse ridden furiously over the plain.

Such were the trifling subjects that interested the heathen mind generally, but it is evident from the Scripture narrative that they were not the "hard questions" with which this Arabian Princess proved Solomon. The fame of his wisdom and wealth and works had indeed reached her. But it was not his riches nor his scientific knowledge nor his literary abilities nor anything that he had done, except the building of "The Temple," that had awakened her interest. For Hiram, King of Tyre, was rich and learned, and, according to Josephus, often pitted himself against Solomon as aspiring to be his equal, and his fame was quite as extended as that of Solomon by his commerce, for they were very closely united in all such adventures. Egypt also was the seat of great learning, and her monarch was a King of great power and influence. But the Queen of Sheba was not attracted to either Hiram or Pharaoh and never thought of going to them to have questions that troubled her answered. But it was the fame of Solomon "concerning the name of the Lord" (v. 1), his connection with "The Temple," and the worship of God that drew her to him. She evidently felt that no one else could so well satisfy her longings. So "she communed with him of all that was in her heart." (II. Chron., ix., 1.)

RICHES NOT ESSENTIAL.

So it is always. Riches and learning are powerful elements of influence, but they are not the most essential elements. They can be used to extend a knowledge of God and of His grace and for the comfort of men, and so the child of God has the grandest of all incentives to acquire them. They can also enable one to answer many very necessary and important questions concerning material things and earthly conditions. But everywhere there are men who are troubled with "hard questions" concerning time and eternity—concerning God and their own souls—which by themselves they cannot answer. Only those who are taught of God and are filled with the Holy Ghost are able truly to answer them. For St. Paul says: "God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." (I. Cor., ii., 9-12.) Thus all such stand in the world to witness for Christ. It is a high calling. It is a higher privilege. But alas! how few there are whose chief attraction is in matters "concerning the name of the Lord"!

This, however, was what drew the Queen of Sheba to Solomon. But she would never probably have sought him—even because of "the things" concerning the name of the Lord"—if she had been satisfied with herself, with her own attainments, or with the condition of things in her own land. She evidently hungered after something which her own country, with all its spices and riches, was unable to give her. Then the ships of Solomon brought to her shores the news of his wisdom and greatness, and this news was always coupled with the cheering glory of Jerusalem, "The Temple" on Mount Zion, and the wonderful presence of God which filled it. Solomon and this glorious God were always linked together in every report that reached her. It opened new hopes to her mind. Perhaps he could satisfy the cravings of her soul.

Thus—like the anxious sinner in every age—his Queen of Sheba was "oppressed with perplexing difficulties—discouraging objections—and distressing fears." (Scott's Com.)—and—she determined to seek help at all costs. It was no easy task. It involved a long and untried journey. The very thought of the undertaking not unlikely met with opposition and ridicule from those about her. To carry it out, she must break through many of the prejudices and customs regarding the seclusion of women which had been binding for ages. Moreover, it involved great self-denial and personal inconvenience. She must give up the comforts of home and, with a costly retinue, undertake for a long time great fatigue. But all of these she braved that she might have the hunger of her soul satisfied. And she knew of no one who could satisfy it but one who was always associated in her mind with the "unknown God."

EFFECT ON THE QUEEN.

When she came to him her difficulties were removed—her mind was enlightened—and her spirit refreshed. But this was not all. She went away deeply impressed with the thought that all who enjoyed fellowship with him must be in a most blessed condition. "Happy"—said she in the fullness of her heart—"Happy are thy men, happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee—and that hear thy wisdom. Blessed be the Lord, thy God, which delighteth in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel—because the Lord loved Israel forever—therefore, made He thee King, to do judgment and justice." (vv. 8-10.) "This is the impression every child of God should make upon those with whom he comes in contact. How many do it?

The Queen of Sheba, however, was not only thus impressed with the blessedness of him who served the Lord and of those who are in fellowship with him, but she felt that she could never make an adequate return for all that she had herself received. The best that she had—and the most that she had—would be but a feeble acknowledgment of her indebtedness. So she gladly "gave the King an hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of spices very great store, and precious stones; there came no more such abundance of spices as these which the Queen of Sheba gave to King Solomon." (V. 10.) Thus she glorified God and honored His servant.

So she returned to her home with all of her "hard questions" answered, and the deep longings of her heart satisfied. She never regretted her long journey or anything that it had cost to see "The Temple" of God and to commune with him who had built it. It had opened to her a new and brighter life. Spiritually, the same experiences produce similar results even yet. Blessed are those who are not condemned by the Queen of Sheba. (Matt., xii., 42.)

COTTON.—Speculation in cotton has shown a steadily subsiding volume since "bureau" day, when the total sales were a matter of 2,000,000 bales. Yesterday they were only 600,000 bales, with the operations confined it would seem almost to the professional class. The market opened firm at an advance of 10@16 points following higher Liverpool cables, which encouraged further bull support and covering. For a time it continued firm, with the active month still at the front, showing net advances of 15@18 points, but this level attracted a renewal of bear pressure and liquidation, and prices reacted to a net gain of about 7@11 points. Following this there was a period of narrow and irregular fluctuations, after which the market became very firm again, led by New Orleans, where the bull leader was said to be bidding for large blocks in advanced prices. The range of contract prices was as follows:

BREADSTUFFS.—WHEAT.—The after effects of Government report figures were seen in a strong wheat market practically from the opening to the close, with business on a larger scale than usual, and including an increase of outside interest, besides some foreign buying of cash wheat at the opening. Although some of the edge was taken off the market near the close by a drop in corn, last prices were still ¾@1¼c higher than the preceding night. The advance was attended by reports of an increase in export business. New York reporting 25 loads through the outports, while Chicago had even more, claiming that some Manitoba wheat had also been worked. Among some of the local trade, however, there was disposition to question the export trade. Quotations at cash wheat, free on board, afloat, basis, were as follows: No. 1 Northern, Duluth, 89½c; No. 2 hard, New York, 88½c; No. 2 red, New York, 91½c.

LATEST CUSTOMS RULINGS.

Decision That Commissions to be Non-Dutiable Must Be in Excess of Market Value.

Judge Henderson M. Somerville of the Board of United States General Appraisers handed down a decision yesterday further defining the dutiable status of commissions on which there has been much controversy. His decision overruled appeals by Davis & Hosten, Stix, Baer & Fuller, and the Standard House Furnishing Company against the Collector of Customs at Port Townsend, Washington, and the Surveyor at St. Louis.

Judge Somerville ruled that where the item of a commission paid to an agent for the purchase of the goods is added by the appraising officer to the par or value of merchandise to make foreign market value, it cannot be held to be non-dutiable, and that it can only be exempted in cases when, if added to the invoice value of the goods, the foreign market value would be exceeded.

Other protests overruled were by S. Johnson, Bloomingdale Brothers, George B. Dorsey, Fleming & Co., Hensel Bruckner & Lorbacher, Lesher, Whitman & Co., and W. R. Grace & Co., New York; George H. Lennard and others, Boston; J. L. Ely and Sanborn, Vail & Co., San Francisco; Andrew Kaw & Co. and Hop Chong Lung, Portland, Ore., and the Asiatic Export and Import Company and M. Seller & Co., Port Townsend, Washington.

Protests sustained were by George C. Lichtenstein, New York; John Wanamaker, Philadelphia; Balfour, Guthrie & Co., Port Townsend, Washington and Los Angeles, and D. Weisenbaum and M. J. Brandenstein & Co., San Francisco.

FUR TRADE HEALTHY.

C. C. Shayne Says Failures Are Not Caused by Any Lack of Demand.

Fur trade conditions are not depressed, in spite of recent failures, according to Christopher C. Shayne, who, however, says that changes have occurred in the popular demand, which have brought disaster to small dealers who had embarked in trade without sufficient capital.

"Fur-bearing animals are becoming scarcer," he said. "This country is increasing in wealth, and to-day wealthy people are spending more money for furs than ever before. There have been only 30,000 Alaskan seals caught this season. One of this number not more than 16,000 are fit to make up into garments. It takes on an average five skins to make up a fashionable garment. Now, how many women can obtain sealskin coats when there are only 16,000 skins to furnish the entire world?

"Like statements are true in regard to otter and Russian sables. Royal ermine is more extensively worn than ever. Chinchilla and Siberian squirrel are in fashionable demand. Moleskin is being sold to some extent to those who desire everything new and in the extreme of style, but I believe the demand for them will be short-lived, for I am satisfied the skin will prove not to be durable and generally unsatisfactory. I don't recommend them.

"The fur trade is in a healthy condition, and people who have capital to do business have an opportunity to make as much money now as they ever had, and those who have the capital are making the money."

WOMAN'S DEBTS $212,274.

Files Petition in Bankruptcy to Rid Herself of Liabilities on Property.

The liabilities are $212,274, of which $120,400 are secured by mortgages, and assets of $600 in a claim for rent. She formerly owned a one-seventh interest in the Anderson Building, 12 to 16 John Street, which she transferred in April, 1902, and the greater part of her liabilities is on mortgages on that property made jointly by her and the other six owners, one of the mortgages being for $175,000 to Bayard H. Bennett of Bayonne and the other to Franklin Seymour for $10,000.

She also had a liability of $12,000 to William Tatnall secured by a mortgage on property at Woodycrest Avenue, and $8,749 to the Dry Dock Savings Institution on a deficiency judgment.

IMPORTS OF DRY GOODS.

Imports of dry goods at the Port of New York for the week were valued at $2,004,785, as against $2,290,006 for the previous week and $2,199,130 for the corresponding week last year. The value of the dry goods imported was $2,289,878, as against $2,234,884 in the previous week and $2,884,031 in the corresponding week last year.

Customs Brokers' Election.

For the first time in years there was a contest at the annual election yesterday of the Custom Brokers and Clerks' Association of the Port of New York. The "regular" ticket was defeated, Harry Robinson receiving four votes less for the position of President than were cast for Finlay Beckett, who headed the opposition ticket. The total vote was 176. Mr. Robinson has served three years. For Vice President E. W. Gambers was over Martin E. Stiner. Secretary, George Steven Young; Treasurer, J. A. Sonderfeld, and Collector, F. H. Bassett were unanimously re-elected.

Record Price for String Beans.

Florida string beans sold at $9 per basket at wholesale yesterday, the highest point ever touched in this market. The usual price is $1.50 to $2.50 at this season, and they have sold as low as 50 cents. Cold weather is assigned as the principal reason of the shortage which caused the advance.

BRITISH AFRICAN COTTON.

Grant to Aid Its Cultivation to be Proposed in Parliament.

LONDON, Dec. 11.—An imperial grant in aid of cotton growing in British West Africa will be proposed in the course of the coming session of Parliament, and it is understood that the suggestion has been favorably received by the Government departments concerned.

The British Cotton Growing Association is preparing full details of the results of the experimental plantings for submission to the Colonial Office. The recent excitement in Lancashire caused by the report of the Agricultural Department at Washington of a shortage in the American crop is being utilized as a reason why every effort should be made to render the British cotton trade independent of the United States.

TRADE CONDITIONS.

Trade conditions are commented upon by Dun's Review as follows:

Developments are not encouraging as to cotton spinning, but there is evidence of better conditions in the iron and steel industry, while retail trade feels the usual impetus as the holidays approach. Some large department stores report that sales exceed last year's, which is especially favorable in view of the contraction that has occurred in many branches of business, the lower wages now in force, and the losses that have occurred in Wall Street. Idleness among New England lumber mills is offset by increased activity in the south. Owing to pressure of grain cars, there is still delay in handling freight promptly at a few Western points, but as a rule traffic facilities are adequate, and railway earnings for November show an average gain of 4 per cent. over last year. Gold exports and imports for the last week at this city were considerably smaller than a year ago, but preliminary figures of farm products sent abroad during November from all ports of the country show a phenomenal gain of $64,797,218 over 1902, chiefly due to a new enormous record of cotton shipments. More gold has arrived from abroad, and further engagements promise immunity from serious stringency in the money market during the remainder of the year, unless the stock market should develop a more pronounced upward tendency than now seems probable. There has been a sufficient increase in speculation, however, to raise bank clearings at this city 3.8 per cent. above the same week last year, which is the first gain that has been recorded since July.

Despite the reductions in the iron trade it seems almost certain that the situation will show some improvement by the end of the month, although inventories always retard operations during December. Throughout the industry, however, there is a growing sentiment of hopefulness regarding the new year. Prices have steadied and orders are being placed more liberally, although new business is not of an urgent nature. Shipments outstanding over the first quarter of 1904. Structural steel is sought freely, several large contracts being under consideration, and many smaller orders have been actually placed. Wage conferences are under adjustment, numerous instances promising amicable settlement before long, and coke producers are arranging a selling agency that is expected to put the coke situation on a firmer basis. The chief revert among the minor metals was a manipulation in tin, which forced prices sharply upward, but demand for consumption is not brisk.

At the leading staple exchanges there is unusual activity at high level of prices. Cotton fell back to a minimum, but the decline touched last week, but is still $12.35 a bale above the price of the corresponding date last year, which was by no means a low point. It is not yet possible to estimate what effect on the situation will be produced by speculation, although the existence of a heavy short amount undoubtedly accounts for much of the sharp rise. There is a wide difference of opinion as to the accuracy of the Government report, but even those who are most confident that the figures were understated exhibit caution regarding the establishment of another short interest. Had a similar conservatism selling earlier in the season prices would not be there normal. If spinners do not purchase at the present level, quotations will decline irrespective of production. Wheat was forwarded to market more freely, but offering of options found ready absorption, and prices ruled high. Despite some unfavorable dispatches Winter wheat promises well. Domestic receipts at primary markets for the week were 6,397,000 bushels, against 4,129,653 last year, and exports aggregated 3,978,617 bushels, compared with 4,354,044 a year ago. Corn arrivals were 4,586,462 bushels, against 1,850,240, and Atlantic Coast shipments of 748,175 bushels compare with 714,561 in 1902.

Liabilities of commercial failures thus far reported for December amount to $5,343,004, of which $3,725,098 were in manufacturing, $1,970,683 in trading, and $666,175 in other commercial lines. Failures this week numbered 321 in the United States against 291 last year, and 20 in Canada, as compared with 20 a year ago.

Bradstreet's says on the subject:

Distribution along consumptive lines grows in volume with the continuance of cold weather and the nearer approach of the holidays. Jobbing distribution also feels the stimulus in reorders to fill depleted stocks, and the indications are that a fair volume of business will be done in the Spring. Wholesale trade generally is quiet, as usual at this period, and industry shows slackening in some lines. The improvement in crude iron appears to be holding, indications being that, at various at several markets, Eastern shoe manufacturers are still shipping heavily on Winter account, have an average Spring business booked, and are looking for a good trade next Fall. Money is easier and is returning from the country more freely, but collections are still susceptible of improvement. Bank clearings, swelled somewhat by speculation, which, by the first gain, has taken hold of the country as a whole since last July. Railway earnings are really good, and will show a gain of fully 5 per cent. over last November. Notwithstanding export trade, swelled largely by heavy cotton shipments, will come close to best previous records.

Seasonal conditions, stock-taking, or readjustments to lessened demand are all assuming prominence for the curtailment of outdoor activity, such as building, or for reduced running time or suspensions in a variety of industries employing large numbers of hands. The reduction in cotton mill wages now nearly affects 80,000 operatives, and future wage scales are the subject of much thought in the iron and steel industry. High raw material remains the margin of profit in cotton manufacturing precarious, and a wide spread sentiment is now in evidence, aided at the South, is now frequently talked of, but the feasibility of agreement by American manufacturers as a whole is doubted.

The closing months of the year's end make for the usual crop of business suspensions, which are, however, not regarded as seriously as some time ago.

Wheat, including flour, exports for the week ended Dec. 10, aggregate 3,978,617 bushels, against 4,201,504 bushels last week, 3,761,047 bushels this week last year, 3,879,509 bushels in 1901, and 4,725,577 bushels in 1900. For twenty-three weeks of the current year they aggregate 77,436,906 bushels, against 111,002,405 bushels in 1902, 121,773,239 bushels in 1901, and 81,089,171 bushels in 1900. Corn exports for the week aggregate 843,287 bushels, against 1,008,261 bushels last week, 1,007,266 bushels a year ago, 270,607 bushels in 1901, and 4,832,495 bushels in 1900. The twenty-three weeks of the present cereal year show they aggregate 20,264,451 bushels, against 29,836,205 bushels in 1902, 11,301,020 bushels in 1901, and 31,893,179 bushels in 1900.

Trade is improving at New Orleans, which reports a brighter outlook, but a shorter sugar crop than expected. Dallas reports the largest business in years, but wheat suffering from drought. Feeling at Birmingham is much more hopeful in tone, which is up 50 to 75 cents from the low point of the panic, and Charleston report some cotton being sold. Atlanta reports good trade, with manufacturers of machinery and confectionery running night and day. Cotton receipts at Memphis are 24 per cent. smaller than a year ago.

No One Worried Over the Accident to the Steamers Sterling Gem—Captain Got Orders by Wireless to Return to Queenstown and Reached Port Safely.

QUEENSTOWN, Dec. 9.—The steamship Kroonland of the Red Star Line, from Antwerp, Dec. 5, for New York, which sent a wireless telegraph message last night saying that her steam tiller was broken and that she was returning to Queenstown, steering with her engines, arrived here at 8:30 o'clock this morning. She was attended by a tug, which had been sent from here in response to her wireless message.

The saloon passengers landed this evening. They are enthusiastic over the utility of the Marconi wireless telegraph system, by means of which news of the accident was received here yesterday. The breakdown of the steering apparatus occurred at noon Tuesday, when the Kroonland was 130 miles west of Fastnet. Capt. Doxrud immediately sent a wireless message to Crookhaven for the agents of the line in Antwerp, describing the damage and informing them that the steamer must abandon her voyage. A reply was received within an hour and a half, whereupon Capt. Doxrud complied with the instructions sent him to return to Queenstown.

Meanwhile three-fourths of the saloon passengers and a number of those in the second cabin sent wireless messages to friends in various parts of Great Britain and Europe, and many of them received replies before Fastnet was sighted from the steamer. Some of the wireless messages were cabled to the United States. In some cases the senders asked friends for money, and the replies authorized the purser to advance funds to them, which was done before land was sighted.

The cabin passengers will go to New York on the Teutonic and the steerage passengers will go later on some other steamer.

FINANCIAL.

THE COLORADO FUEL & IRON COMPANY

Five Per Cent. Ten-Year Convertible Gold Debentures of the Company

At the request of holders of debentures the undersigned have consented to act as a committee to assist in placing the affairs of the company on a permanent financial basis. The committee now represents a majority of all the outstanding debentures.

We have conferred with officers and Directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Company, and are acting in harmony with them.

We have also conferred with persons representing a majority of the stock of the company, and are acting harmony with them.

We find that the company, in undertaking extensive enlargements of its plants and improvements to its property two years or more ago, incurred obligations for labor, material, and construction which have proved to be far in excess of its cash resources; that in order to meet its financial requirements as they have arisen it has been necessary for the company to sell a portion of its property; that it is possible to recover the property sold at the selling price, with reasonable interest; that so to do, and at the same time to provide sufficient money to complete improvements begun, to fulfill the obligations of the company, and to place it in a position where it may conduct its business with reasonable economy, will require about $18,000,000.

A plan has been formed for the creation of a funding mortgage to be made by the Fuel Company or by another corporation, to secure an issue of bonds which, with the stock hereinafter mentioned, will be used to provide these necessary funds, and also in exchange for the present debentures. The new security will be a five per cent. gold bond, supported by a consolidated first mortgage directly upon all the properties recently sold by the Fuel Company, as above mentioned, and upon all the remaining property of the Fuel Company directly or by pledge of debentures, subject only to the prior liens now existing on a part of the property which were taken at the time of the issue of the debentures. The bonds to be exchanged for debentures will be convertible into stock of the company on terms similar to those by which debentures are now convertible.

THE STOCKHOLDERS WILL BE ASKED TO AUTHORIZE THE INCREASE OF THE EXISTING COMMON CAPITAL STOCK OF THE COMPANY BY ABOUT $6,000,000, THE INCREASED STOCK TO BE USED WITH THE BONDS IN PROCURING THE MONEYS NECESSARY FOR THE PURPOSE OF THE COMPANY AND FOR THE OTHER PURPOSES AS PROVIDED IN THE PLAN.

A syndicate representing a majority of the stock of the company which has hitherto assisted the company to meet its financial obligations by purchasing portions of its property has agreed to convey these properties to the Fuel Company, or to this committee or as the committee may direct, for the price at which they were acquired, with reasonable interest.

THIS SYNDICATE HAS ALSO AGREED TO UNDERWRITE, WITHOUT COMMISSIONS, AS MUCH OF THE PROPOSED NEW ISSUE OF BONDS AND STOCK ABOVE MENTIONED AS MAY BE NECESSARY TO PROVIDE THE CASH REQUIREMENTS OF $18,000,000, OR THEREABOUTS, RECEIVING ONE $1,000 BOND AND $200 OF STOCK FOR EACH $800 PAID.

The syndicate has further agreed to offer the bonds and stock thus underwritten to the stockholders of the company at the underwriting price, waiving for its members as stockholders the right to participate.

The syndicate further agrees to offer such part of said bonds and stock thus underwritten as are not taken by the stockholders to the depositing debenture holders in the proportion of their holdings at the underwriting price to the syndicate, waiving for its members as debenture holders the right to participate.

Any of the bonds and stock so underwritten not taken by stockholders or debenture holders will be taken and paid for by the syndicate at the price named.

THE PLAN CONTAINS PROVISIONS FOR PAYMENT OF THE NEXT MATURING COUPON ON THE DEBENTURES DEPOSITED HEREUNDER, IN CASE SUCH PLAN SHALL BECOME EFFECTIVE.

A plan and agreement are now on deposit with the Continental Trust Company of the City of New York, 26 Broad Street, where copies may be procured.

In view of the urgency of the situation, holders of debentures are requested forthwith to deposit their debentures with the Trust Company under said plan and agreement.

Certificates of deposit will be issued by the Trust Company on receipt of such securities, and application will be made in due course to list the same on the New York Stock Exchange.

NO DEBENTURES WILL BE RECEIVED AFTER DECEMBER 21ST, 1903, except in the discretion of the committee and upon such terms as they may impose.

AMALGAMATED COPPER.

$1,000 REWARD.

At the beginning of my present campaign, to induce the 4,872 original Amalgamated stock-holders, a large proportion of whom claim they were influenced by me to subscribe, to purchase at the then price, $38⅝, an amount equal to their allotment, that they might make up their losses when it had advanced to 100 or over, I stated in advertisements that I would make an offer to each of the original subscribers. This immediately called forth denunciation by Amalgamated's enemies, who widely advertised their unqualified statement that I did not have a list of the original subscribers, which they shortly afterward mended by stating that while I had a garbled list, they wished to emphasize that I was not working from the original or any authorized list. This has naturally confused the inve tors and specu ators who were allotted stock. To absolutely set at rest this question, which has been raised for ulterior purposes by the Amalgamated's enemies, I make the following offer:

I will pay the sum of $1,000 to each and every original subscriber to the capital stock of the Amalgamated Copper Company who was allotted stock if he or she does not receive from me through the mail my printed offer of December 2nd, or a satisfactory reason from me why it was not received. (Such as a clerical mistake in writing addresses, change of addresses, etc.)

The following from the WALL STREET DAILY NEWS of to-day is one of the straws which from time to time are picked up by MOTHER NATURE'S SON, Boreas, from the great field of financial untruths, and wafted into the open, where:

You may batter and mangle the truth,
Skin it, stretch it and tan it up brown;
But when you are through and tired to death
It will bob up serenely—WON'T—DOWN!

may be read by him who automobiles a mile a minute along the big common highways without removing his goggles.

"LAWSON VINDICATED.

"Much skeptical comment has been heard regarding Mr. Thomas W. Lawson's statement that he possesses a list of the original subscribers of the stock of the Amalgamated Copper Company. THE WALL STREET DAILY NEWS has made an extensive investigation on its own account, with the result that every original subscriber it was able to locate—and the number was quite large—was in receipt of Mr. Lawson's recent circular. This is clear proof of the correctness of his statement. One case was sufficiently curious to record. A retired broker—a man of eminence—who received the Lawson circular, informed our reporter that there must be some mistake, that he had never subscribed to Amalgamated. This at once raised a doubt as to the genuineness of the Lawson list. Upon request, however, the gentleman took the pains to go over his old books, and, sure enough, he had subscribed for fifty shares, on which he received an allotment of twenty only. The transaction had been for a customer, but stood in the broker's name, 'and,' added the broker, 'they were sold at twenty points' profit.' Mr. Lawson's veracity stands unimpeached."

"Office of THE WALL STREET DAILY NEWS.

My Dear Mr. Lawson:—

It may interest you to know that the gentleman mentioned in the Wall Street Daily News this morning as one of the original subscribers of Amalgamated was none other than the distinguished.....Mr.....did not wish his name published on account of the smallness of the transaction, but has no objection to your becoming personally cognizant of his identity.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) JOHN G. WILSON, Editor."

The subscriber mentioned by the Wall Street Daily News is mistaken. His subscription was for fifty shares. He was allotted but 10, not 20. My only regret, in connection with my present effort to induce original subscribers to purchase Amalgamated stock, is that I am bound by Stock Exchange rules which prevent me from advertising its merits; but if those interested will send their addresses to us, as below, they will receive the circulars which are and will be daily issued during my present campaign, and the distribution of which it is unnecessary for me to say is not prohibited, as are the newspaper advertisements.

THE FINANCIAL MARKETS

Call money firmer, 5@6½ per cent.

The stock market yesterday continued its irregular and reactionary movement, without doing any very great damage to prices, and practically none to sentiment upon the outlook. The most apparent exceptions—Steel and Brooklyn Rapid Transit—are not really exceptions at all. It is true that nearly 300,000 shares of Steel, over one-third of the day's total business, were sold with concessions in price upon the day's business of 1¼, but it does not follow that there is any argument regarding the dividend or the outlook in the industry. That phase of Steel's fall is probably over, and, upon the contrary, there is every reason to believe that the fluctuation itself now is the objective, since the business is done substantially if not exclusively by those who profit by the fluctuations, and not by the dividends. They look to the price fluctuations for their profits, and care nothing about the industry or the dividends except as "talking points" to influence the price. Why wait six months for a dividend when the price can be moved up or down as much in a day, and do caps. The same comment is applicable to the fall in Brooklyn and the tractions. The talk about them has been the purest patter so far as any immediate practical effect upon their intrinsic merits is concerned, but it has sufficed to move them up, and they can be moved back again as well. This is a speculative market, swayed by sentimental considerations, and too curious examination of ways and wherefores is unwarranted. Amalgamated failed to advance upon progress with the "fair trial" legislation, and there was no movement worth mention among substantial properties which have some real and close connection with general conditions, such as the trunk lines and Grangers. The most notable advance was in People's Gas, upon refusal to reopen the quo warranto proceedings which resulted favorably to the company a few weeks since.

In the bond market the activity and weakness in Steel 5 per cents was of course the feature. In other descriptions business was not large, nor prices firm. Evidently issues which have been floated must take care of themselves while promoters take care of those which must be floated. Those who think that sound improvement in stock prices is forecast by strength in the bond market look for this sign in vain at this time.

The cotton market still reflects the inconsistency of strong prices upon a crop movement giving no signs of a short crop. The speculative options of wheat reflected the Government's unfavorable report of acreage and condition, which the Granger railways withstood without difficulty in the stock market. If the Government reports were trustworthy, it is rather early to borrow anxiety now. The crop can recover from worse conditions than the present several times over at a stage of growth more critical than now. The forecasts of the bank statement at last promise some sign of the receipts of gold, which heretofore have been swallowed up in mysterious hiding-places. Though lost to sight, they have nevertheless affected the situation so favorably that it can be said that the crop movement has been financed better than was expected, and certainly better than in other years. The return of the money to this centre is another question about which all that can be said is that the auguries are favorable. Opinion from the interior is reinforced by quotations of domestic exchange and movements of currency to the effect that after the new year there will be the accustomed ease, and that the pinch at the close of the year promises nothing abnormal.

WALL STREET TOPICS.

Sentiment Mixed.—At the close of the market yesterday even some of the outspoken bulls of last week admitted that they found it difficult to take any decided position as to the outlook. The return to prominence of the Western bear party who were industriously depressing Steel yesterday, and the timidity which the public already is showing after having bought more or less freely for a day or two, puts the market back in a position very similar to that which it occupied before the recent advance began, except, of course, that prices are again at a higher level, and, it may be, more likely to yield to bear pressure than they would have been at the lower level. Free and easy predictions of bad things in store for the market, Steel in particular, were used as a means of helping the decline, and the market has too recently recovered from a state of semi-demoralization to deprive such suggestions of all influence.

***

Railroads Relatively Strong.—The decline of about 2 points in United States Steel preferred was not duplicated in any of the active railroad stocks, which, despite the pressure upon the market, held fairly well. Toward the close a few of the issues of this class sold off more or less abruptly, but the net losses were small, and some issues even made net gains. Erie, which was again very active, sold up almost a point during the first part of the day, and though it sold off with the rest of the list kept a small fraction as a net gain.

***

London again became a buyer, and the higher prices sent over from there before the opening of our market contributed to the strength displayed in the initial transactions. The trading for foreign account amounted all told to about 40,000 shares, of which there were bought on balance about 20,000 shares, or probably about half as much as had been sold on balance for London account the day before. In some stocks the 3 P. M. London quotations were much above the New York close, notably, Steel preferred, which was up 1¼ points.

***

United States Steel.—Of the day's total transactions of 843,054 shares, Steel preferred contributed 289,350 shares, or more than one-third. To all appearances Steel was being depressed for the effect upon the rest of the list, and doubtless the heavy selling of this stock did much to deter would-be buyers who otherwise might have found encouragement in the predictions current early in the day that the railroads were to be moved up sharply. Western houses were prominent as sellers of Steel and Western speculators were credited with the effort to mark the stock down. The decline was helped by the discussion of published reports to the effect that the earnings for the present quarter would not be more than $16,000,000, though perhaps still enough to cover the suggestions circulated that some bad news on the stock was coming out. Steel common again sold down to 10—its low record.

***

Tractions.—All of the tractions closed with net losses, even Brooklyn Rapid Transit, which at various times in the day was said to be "marvelously strong," losing 1½ points net. A somewhat sensational decline occurred in Brooklyn soon after the opening which was commonly said to have been planned by the bull forces in the stock for the purpose of shaking out undesired followers. The decline, in fact, was rapid enough to disturb any but the most confirmed believers in the recent movement in the stock. From 51⅝ it dropped abruptly to 49, but rallied almost as sharply. Later in the day it again declined, but more quietly and with less recovery. The other tractions, which were relatively dull, showed losses varying from three-eighths of a point to 1¼ points.

***

People's Gas was active and exceptionally strong, following confident buying of the stock on the previous day in anticipation of a favorable announcement in the litigation over the question of seventy-five-cent gas. News came during the day that the Supreme Court of Illinois had handed down a decision refusing to reopen the case decided a few weeks ago in favor of the company. The principal buying of the stock early in the day was by a house prominently identified with the stock, and this fact helped to influence opinion. The prediction that it would sell up to par before the day was out came within half a point of being true, sales being made as high as 99½, and the close at 99 showing a net gain of 2¼ points.

***

Amalgamated.—Despite the announcement published in the middle of the day that the Governor of Montana had signed the Fair Trial bill, which is supposed to help the cause of the Amalgamated Copper Company, the stock, after selling up to 47, declined to 46¾ and closed only an eighth higher, being unchanged for the day.

***

General Electric lost 1¼ points on trading in less than 1,000 shares. The regular quarterly dividend of 2 per cent. was announced during the day without any extra dividend, which, recently it was rumored, was likely to be declared at this time.

***

Toledo Detianing, which last sold at 24¾, was quoted at the close yesterday at 3 bid, offered at 5½, and earlier had been quoted still wider apart at 1⅝ bid, offer at 7. The collapse in the stock followed the passing recently of the dividend on the common stock and the reduction of that on the preferred. The stock has never had a wide market, and brokers have frequently reported that it was next to impossible to sell it.

CURRENCY MOVEMENT.

Reviewing the movement of currency during the past week, the Wall Street Journal says in its issue of this morning:

The principal movements of currency this week indicate a gain of $1,985,800 in reserve held by the banks.

They received from the interior $5,851,700 and sent out for the interior $3,965,900, of which there was transferred through the Sub-Treasury $1,975,000 to New Orleans. The gain from the interior was $881,800.

Gold imports were $1,162,000, making the total at this point on this movement $9,141,100, as reported by the Custom House.

Other receipts of new gold were $2,000,800; namely, $1,918,700 on New York Assay Office checks, which included payment for part of the gold imported at Boston, $972,000 on telegraphic transfer from San Francisco against the deposit at the mint there of imported Japanese yen, and $344,000 on Seattle Assay Office checks.

The Sub-Treasury paid $210,400 in redemption of 5 per cent. bonds of 1904.

Other disbursements by the Sub-Treasury were $14,677,700; payments made by the Sub-Treasury for customs, internal revenue, 5 per cent. redemption fund, &c., were $30,716,000. The loss on Sub-Treasury operations proper was $2,000,000.

The total gain from the interior, new gold, domestic and imported, and bond redemptions was $4,094,100; deducting the loss of $2,058,300 on Sub-Treasury operations proper, the net gain was $1,935,800.

The gain on the direct interior movement was $2,886,800, comparing with a gain of $2,769,800 in the previous week. There was an increase in transfers through the Sub-Treasury to New Orleans, but the demand for currency at San Francisco appears to have been satisfied.

Receipts of currency from the West are increasing more rapidly than those from the South, and the principal gains are still from near-by and Eastern points, representing to some extent the accumulation here of funds for the January disbursements.

The loss on Sub-Treasury operations is the smallest for three weeks, although pension payments were only $470,000, comparing with $787,000 in the previous week. Customs collections were $3,197,100, a daily average of $562,000, exactly the same as in the previous week.

The Sub-Treasury received from banks and sent to Washington for redemption $3,717,000 mutilated currency.

PHILADELPHIA PRICES.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 11.—Local traders did not manifest much disposition to operate in the local issues to-day, the feeling prevailing that unless the decline in United States Steel issues is promptly checked it will carry the general market with it. They were equally averse to selling short, owing to reports of a large short interest in the Steels. Trading consequently was tame, with an unimportant movement in prices.

American Railways was off ¼, Cambria Steel ¼, Consolidated Lake Superior preferred ⅝, (recording a new low price for the stock;) Philadelphia Company, ⅝, and United Gas ⅝. Consolidated Traction of New Jersey advanced ½; General Asphalt preferred ⅝, and International Smokeless Powder preferred 4½. Total sales, 27,522 shares; $68,100 bonds.

GIRL ROBBED NEAR CHURCH

Young Woman Beaten by Thugs While on Her Way to a Fair—Indignant at Police Insinuations.

Miss May Harper, eighteen years old, of 1,401 Dean Street, Brooklyn, was confined to her home yesterday as a result of a bold assault and robbery almost in front of the New York Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church on Thursday night, in which she figured as the victim.

Miss Harper, who is a daughter of George W. Harper, an insurance broker, is a member of the New York Avenue Church, which is at the corner of Dean Street. She was held up while on the way to attend a fair in the church, she being one of the young women in charge of the flower booth. In a small hand bag which she carried she had $7.50 in money, which she had taken in at the booth.

As she neared the church two men came up behind her. One of them seized her by the shoulders while the other wrenched the hand bag from her grasp. Miss Harper screamed for help and struggled with the men, but they threw her to the ground, and one of them kicked her in the side and face. When people came rushing out of the church in response to the young woman's cries the two men ran off. Ex-Controller Bird S. Coler, who is a member of the church, came out with others and helped carry Miss Harper into the building. Mr. Coler then summoned a physician, and Miss Harper was revived. She was later taken to her home in a carriage.

Word was sent to the Atlantic Avenue Police Station, and Capt. Kenny and Patrolman Mulroy made an investigation. They found Miss Harper's bag near the church. The money was still in it. From the first the police, for some reason, showed a disposition to discredit Miss Harper's story. Patrolman Mulroy, in a report, said that there was no doubt that Miss Harper had been struck by a man, but he doubted that there was any robbery. A diamond breastpin which the young woman wore, he said, had not been stolen.

The theory of the police seems to be that Miss Harper had a quarrel with a young man with whom she is acquainted, and that he struck her. Mulroy said that the young man was a member of the church, and that he knew his name. He refused to divulge the name, however.

Miss Harper and the members of her family were indignant when this idea of the case was communicated to them. The young woman denied emphatically that she knew either of the men who attacked her. She had never seen them before, she declared.

Daniel Myers Acquitted.

Daniel Myers of the drug firm of Benton, Myers & Co. of Cleveland, Ohio, who for several days has been on trial in the General Sessions on a charge of grand larceny in connection with the failure of the defunct Manhattan Fire Insurance Company, of which he was President, was acquitted yesterday, after the jury had been out for two hours. He will be tried later on another indictment growing out of the same transaction.

DENOUNCED REFEREE SYSTEM.

Surrogate Thomas Told Law's Delay Commission It Was a Relic of the Dark Ages.

Surrogate Thomas, while a witness before the State Commission on the Law's Delay at the home of the Bar Association last night, denounced the referee system as unworthy of any just and civilized community.

"I think the first duty of a civilized State is to offer an arbitrator to its citizens free of cost," said the Surrogate. "I think the practice of litigants paying fees to a Judge, as is practically the case under the referee system, is a relic of the dark ages and has no place in any modern country, except possibly in Turkey. I think it barbarous. I don't believe we need any more Surrogates, but if that is the only way out of the referee system, let us have two or three or six additional Surrogates if necessary."

Surrogate Thomas said he was in favor of having two additional law assistants appointed in the Surrogates' Department, making the total number five, and that legislation should be sought empowering the Surrogates to refer cases to these assistants.

The commission will hold a joint session with the Judiciary Committee of the Bar Association some day next week with a view of obtaining the indorsement of that body for the recommendations it expects to submit to Gov. Odell. J. Noble Hayes, counsel for the commission, said last night he thought the report would be ready by Jan. 1.

TOPICS OF THE WEEK

MR. SWINBURNE'S recent illness, from which, at latest accounts, he was happily recovering, was a case of double pneumonia. He is in his sixty-seventh year, and for a time his physicians were in doubt of his recovery. His illness has caused the postponement of the publication of his new volume of poems, which was expected to be one of the books of this Winter. There is still much work for him to do with it; but it may appear before Spring.

We publish this week a noteworthy review of M. Elie Metchnikoff's already much-discussed new book, from the strictly scientific point of view. It is perfectly true that the point of view of readers of such books as "The Nature of Man" is generally unscientific, but it is well that a book dealing with such a subject should be treated, in a literary review, according to its own pretensions. M. Metchnikoff is a man of noted scientific attainments, but his book nevertheless has something of the quality of some of the popular writings of Camille Flammarion. M. Metchnikoff's idea that man, properly developed, may live to be 140 years old, is at present more interesting than important.

Dr. Solomon Schechter's address at the memorial services of Dr. Marcus Jastrow, delivered in Philadelphia last month, is printed in Menorah, the Jewish magazine. It is a noble and eloquent tribute of the foremost Jewish scholar now in this country to his famous sociologicist. The last installment, Part XVI., of Dr. Jastrow's monumental work, the "Dictionary of the Targumim, the Talmud and the Midrash," which we noticed a fortnight ago, was published almost simultaneously with the announcement of his death. Dr. Schechter announced in his address that Dr. Jastrow had completed, a few days before his death, the translation of Job for the new edition of the Bible, of which he was general editor, to be issued by the Jewish Publication Society. In the course of his address Dr. Schechter said of Jastrow:

> He succeeded in forming a band of young scholars around him from which some of the best of American Judaica emanated. His death will be felt by all as a personal loss, by his disciples and friends and by the public at large who derived so much benefit from his teaching. I am one of that public, but feel his loss the deeper as we had so many interests in common, and both stood for principles so badly in need of defense. He was one of the last of the great American Jewish scholars who had the benefit both of the old Jeshiba and of the best universities. He left a blank which can hardly be filled.

The Buffalo Historical Society has just issued Volume VI. of its publications, containing a voluminous selection of hitherto unpublished papers relating to the early history of the city on Lake Erie and some of the pioneers of Western New York. There is also a bibliography of books and pamphlets published in Buffalo before 1850, and there are many illustrations, including, in the words of The Buffalo Express, "a reproduction of the earliest known Buffalo picture, a drawing of the chief figures in the talk with the Indians at Buffalo Creek in 1798."

Lord Cromer is one of those modern English men of affairs who find relief from the strain of public duty, which in his case has been unusually severe, in literary avocations. His previously published works, however, have been essays on military topics, while "Who's Who?" states that his "recreations" are "shooting and fishing." Lord Cromer, to prove the contrary, has just published in London a volume of "Paraphrases and Translations from the Greek," which display at least a good knowledge of Greek verse, and a feeling for its beauty, which a man of stern pursuits in the field of action might be assumed for lacking. A London reviewer, reminded of the fact that "Greek literature went on wearing its robes to the end," complains of a certain "boydenish diabolic" in some of these verses, especially the quatrain in which he translates Pyrrha into Katie, and rhymes that name with "hate ye." On the whole, Lord Cromer's book of verses seems to be interesting chiefly because it was written by a titled man of affairs.

In praising the recent speech of Lord Rosebery at the unveiling of a memorial to Macaulay, The London Times couples Mr. Choate and Mr. W. J. Bryan as Americans whose style of oratory is "stamped with the mark of a fine literary taste," and who command "a wide range of literary allusion." This is surely a feather in the cap of Mr. Bryan. The Times thinks that besides Lord Rosebery, Mr. Morley is the only English public speaker who may be ranked with these. Comment would be superfluous. Lord Rosebery's estimate of the influence of Macaulay, and its wide acceptance, shows that the reaction in favor of the great essayist that began even before the death of Matthew Arnold still continues.

We print this week another installment of notices of books for children, of which this season's supply "o'erflows the measure." An article on the ornamental calendars for the new year, issued by the publishing houses, will also commend itself to Christmas shoppers in the book stores. A final article on children's books will be published next week.

Sir Francis C. Burnand's "Records and Reminiscences," just published in London, and to be brought out here later in the Winter, treats of a boy's life at Eton, about which Sir Francis is not very enthusiastic, and involves many youthful memories of London theatres. He remembers Thackeray's "Cider Cellars" and knew the supposed original of Harry Foker. Of Oxford, Burnand seems to have few memories of interest. Of course, his book, which is said to be full of chatty anecdote, is another contribution to the history of London Punch, which already had many "histories" written about it that many a more important institution.

METCHNIKOFF'S PHILOSOPHY

CHARLES LOOMIS DANA, M. D.

ELIE METCHNIKOFF is a biologist and pathologist who has achieved a high position for the originality and importance of his work. His discovery of the function played by the white blood cells in inflammation and immunity was in a degree epoch-making, and has given him his particular distinction. But he has not proved himself entirely inerrant, and some of his cherished views in pathology have not been accepted.

With so high a reputation as a biologist, one would expect something interesting at least from him as a philosopher. We would expect it just as confidently if the author had not posed for a half-tone frontispiece, which is irritatingly out of place in a serious work, or if his editor had not tried to picture him as one of a band of peculiarly self-abnegated scientists, consecrating their lives to the pursuit of knowledge in the laboratories of the Pasteur Institute. We doubt if M. Metchnikoff himself would pretend that the Pasteur Institute breeds any higher type of savant than is to be found elsewhere.

M. Metchnikoff's present work on "The Nature of Man" is made up in part of articles published previously in various journals, principally the "Annals" of the Pasteur Institute. The idea of putting them together in a book to be called "Studies in Optimistic Philosophy" must have come later; this is shown by the long distance the author at times gets from "The Nature of Man" through his personal interest in the fertilization of orchids.

He states in his preface that the book is intended for "disciplined minds," and hence, he includes a special chapter that has a technically medical character. The apologium was well meant, but it would be a mistake for those who are pleased and interested by M. Metchnikoff's essays to think that necessarily their minds are disciplined. We should conclude just the reverse. The book rather appeals to those who like to read about novel interpretations of life and the curious facts that emerge into the understandable from the regions of technical science, to those in fact who are on the watch for the yellowish side of science. M. Metchnikoff tells us how closely the human embryo resembles that of the ape, and how certain it is we belong to that family—are, in fact, the vintage of some particularly happy arboreal and anthropoid conjunctions. This, however, has all been told before, and M. Metchnikoff only tells it again in an attractive way to those who are interested in this stage of their genealogical history. The author does not, perhaps tell the whole story of our gorilla relations. Prof. Sherrington, for example, who learns by "precipitations" that our blood is of the same racial quality as that of the anthropoids, finds also that these chattering animals have no language centres or cerebral centres for it like our own.

But we are not reaching the part of the book which introduces the author's particular philosophy. M. Metchnikoff, in five chapters, is at pains to show the "disharmonies," as he calls them, of the human body. This body, he says, is hampered by an imperfect organization, one containing useless and dangerous organs which make it hard to pursue life with enjoyment or to reach happily its legitimate end. For example, he says that the small hairs on the skin afford us no particular protection and encourage the growth of microbes. We do not need the wisdom teeth; the appendix vermiformis is a functionless and dangerous structure, the presence of the large intestine offers an opportunity to dysentery, and this part of the bowel, as well as the stomach, can be dispensed with. These structures are vestigial, and the bequests of our early mammalian past. Our eyes are poor things, our brains are too slowly developed, the sexual function is badly organized, menstruation enfeebles and cripples women, the function of reproduction is developed before it can be wisely used; the sexual, family, and social instincts lead to infection, and fail to direct the individual in the true path toward happiness for himself and progress for the race. There is an absence of harmony between the instinct for living and the conditions of human existence. This instinct teaches us to live at any cost, or it needlessly leaves us and we are compelled to die when death is no gain.

Thus M. Metchnikoff concludes that the human con-

[illegible], although in many ways perfect and sublime, has serious disharmonies, and these are what lead to the misery of man and the sluggishness of social progress. We are not fully adapted to the conditions of life, as are the orchids or certain kinds of insects.

This idea of human perfection is not, we believe, entirely new, and, although M. Metchnikoff has made some novel suggestions as to what he thinks vestigial, he has not really gone as far as he might have done. Man, for example, can live without a spleen as well, perhaps, as without the appendix, which, by the way, is a really functioning organ, and is growing no smaller. The heart is not properly placed or sufficiently equipped for an erect animal; it is too near the head, and we get apoplexies; it is too far from the feet, and we get dropsies and varicose veins; it has too hard work to do, and we die from arterial disease, unlike the quadruped. The little toe, the twelfth rib, the second kidney, the tip of the wishbone, the fifth ventricle, and whiskers can all be dispensed with, and are, like the modern institution of the family and marriage, more or less disharmonious to the perfect working of the constitution of man. Even with such handicaps, however, the race has managed to get on a bit, and it may be questioned whether some disharmony is not necessary to progress. But we have not got along without much trouble and suffering. So much, indeed, that man has tried to find in philosophy and religion some explanation of the hardness of life and the meaning of it all.

M. Metchnikoff devotes a chapter to showing how all the philosophers, from Confucius to Nietzsche, have failed to explain or lessen the disharmony or give a rational explanation of man's purpose in the world. This chapter is just about as good as any thoughtful student could do by hard cramming. M. Metchnikoff must have spent some good hours in the Bibliothèque Nationale. However, it is, after all, easy to show that all philosophy is vain. Nearly every one is ready to believe a negation because it is much easier to say a philosophy is of no use than to try to understand it. Similarly in twenty-nine pages of text, M. Metchnikoff disposes of all the religions of the world, and shows how futile they are to solve the problem of our disharmonies. These essays are most interesting. Then comes the "Optimistic Philosophy." The object in life is so to live that the disharmonies will be as little injurious as possible, and so to live that with future generations they may decrease; conduct should be so regulated, for example, that some day we may have no appendix or wisdom teeth. Meanwhile we should hold to the faith that science will gradually disperse the disharmonies. By and by the nature of man will be tuned to its environment, and human beings will live to 100 years, enjoying particularly, perhaps, the last ten; then the instinct for living will disappear, and we will want to die; we will die—and that will be all. By the help of science the nature of man will be perfected till we lead a perfect life, each organ and function working to its normal limit and end. We shall live like the bee or the orchid, lives of rapturous adaptation to a harmonious [illegible].

Just now the comfort to those who now have appendicitis or an enteritis must be in the belief that some day science will wipe these conditions out.

This is the essay in optimistic philosophy—whether it is optimistic or philosophical is a question that may be argued.

The casual criticisms which we have made concerning it are accentuated, we confess, by the fact that the book seems in its title and conclusions to claim too much. It is put forth as a reinterpretation of human life. If published as a contribution, and not a key to the mysteries, it would have more value and excite less antagonism. Perhaps, after all, that is M. Metchnikoff's position, for his scientific statements are correct, and his final conclusions, so far as they apply to individual conduct, are wise, and should be most helpful. It is, indeed, best that young people live not to suck at once all the juice out of life, but to live with the hope of having a healthful and useful old age. Their motto should be not "memento mori," or the despicable doctrine of "dum vivimus vivamus," but rather, "memento nasci [illegible]." Live out youth, not too soberly, but so as to reach healthful and useful old age.

We hope the author will succeed in inculcating something of this lesson by his book. He will have done more than it he [illegible] had [illegible] launched a new philosophy.

Shakespeare's Poems.

Henry Frowde is publishing at the Clarendon Press a supplement to his fac-simile reproduction of the Shakespeare First Folio. This supplement will consist of fac-similes of the earliest editions of Shakespeare's "Pericles," "Venus and Adonis," "The Rape of Lucrece," the "Sonnets," and "The Passionate Pilgrim." The five volumes are issued separately, in two styles of binding at different prices, and in one volume, also in two styles of binding. The series is edited by Sidney Lee, who has given in his introductions the latest results of his researches regarding the bibliographical history of each of the four volumes of Shakespeare's poems and his play "Pericles." The edition has been limited to 200 copies for America. All are numbered, and the first volume of each set, "Venus and Adonis," is signed by Mr. Lee.

TREVELYAN'S HISTORY.

Prof. Dodd Reviews The Latest Volumes of the English History of Our Revolution.*

THE many readers of Sir George Trevelyan's first volume on the American Revolution have looked forward with genuine interest to the appearance of the second installment of that work. After five years of waiting we now have Part II., in two volumes, embracing altogether 750 pages.

It will be remembered that the first volume of "The American Revolution" opened with an account of the private affairs of Charles James Fox, and that it ended with the battle of Bunker Hill. Part II. begins with a review of the state of public opinion in England after the news of American events had been published abroad and ends so far as the war is concerned with Washington's bold stroke at the rear of Cornwallis's army at Princeton in the early Winter of 1777—i. e., the two volumes relate the events of a little more than one year. The author does not preface his work with any statement of his general plan, and hence one is left in the dark as to how many volumes to expect in the future. Judging from what we have already, there will probably be in all not less than eight or ten volumes, requiring at least ten years more for their completion.

But the public will not quarrel with Sir George Trevelyan for going thus into details in writing his account of such an important epoch in English and universal history, certainly not Americans, since there is no up-to-date and complete history of the Revolution now available. And to Americans it is further gratifying to have such a work from the pen of an Englishman thoroughly conversant with the politics and policies of his country since the Reformation. Besides this, the pleasing, almost gossipy, and yet scholarly style of presentation makes the book to take rank with our indispensable works on American history.

As to point of view, the author belongs to that class of English writers who see in the American Revolution the "chief and almost solitary fruit and product of the system of personal government which George III. strove for full twenty years to introduce into England." (II., 355.) The "Cambridge History of the United States," recently published, and representing the best scholarship both of England and of this country, scarce so much as mentions the rôle of the King in bringing on the Revolution. Yet without hesitation our author goes so far as to say that the King was chiefly responsible and that the subjugation of the colonists would have been well-nigh as fatal to English liberty as to American aspirations, and this, it is maintained, was as clearly understood and appreciated in England as in America. (II., 149-150.) It was, in very fact, the King's war, and he alone should be held responsible for its consequences. "But this war was all his [the King's] own. He was in sympathy with the policy which led to it. He, and none else, had provided means for carrying it forward; and he now, (after the embarkation of Gen. Howe and his reinforcements for New York,) with quiet and dignified confidence, waited for tidings of victories which would place America at his feet." (I., 103-104.) In order to gain his ends, George III. "packed" Parliament and the bench as systematically as any lawyer ever picked and selected his jury:

> The right of constituents to elect a person of their choice had been denied in words and repeatedly violated in practice. The benches of the Lords and Commons swarmed with an ever-increasing band of placemen and pensioners subsidized by the King; and those gentlemen well knew the work their paymaster expected of them. Their vocation was to harass any Minister who conceived that he owed a duty to the people as well as to the sovereign; and to betray and ruin him if he proved incorrigible in his notions of patriotism. The most famous English statesmen—all, it is not too much to say, who are now remembered with pride by Englishmen of every party—were shut out from the opportunity, and even from the hope, of office; and our national qualities of manliness and independence had come to be a standing disqualification for employment in the nation's service. (II., 151-152.)

Coming to the American side of the controversy, Sir Guy Carleton's control and management of Canada when attacked by the Americans is pointed to as an example of what a wise Governor might have done in New England any time before the Declaration of Independence. But the author's description of the "anarchy" in all the colonies during the transition from the old to the new state of things is perhaps overdrawn, and it is questionable indeed whether the Congress made the States or the States made Congress. Sir George thinks the central created the local authority, while most careful students of the history of the time have hitherto held that the States succeeded, without powers being granted from any outside source, to the authority of the defunct royal governments. There was nowhere any great difficulty in the change, or almost none, and certainly there was not much disorder, even if, theoretically, there was a moment of anarchy; and the honest jockey whom John Adams met and heard declare that there were now no courts and no law need not to have frightened that worthy lawmaker, for the newborn State of Massachusetts would very soon have taught the former better sense had he attempted to put his opinion to the test. As a matter of fact the State Governments elected the delegates, who, when assembled, composed the Continental Congress; they paid these delegates, and even instructed them how to cast their votes on grounds vital every State. When Congress desired the local Government to pass any new laws or make new constitutions it conveyed that desire in the form of a "recommendation"; when the States desired their delegates to attend the Congress or to vote for certain measures, they were "ordered" to do so. It is not, however, Sir George's intention to speak conclusively on this question, and the reason, perhaps, for the tendency to the "anarchy" point of view and for the belief that an unauthorized, illegal body gave the first authority to the State Governments, is that most of the literature available is itself colored; it is the product of authors who wished that such had been the case.

Washington is the real hero of the book. His escape from Long Island, the almost miraculous victory of Trenton, and the coup de main of Princeton are described con amore, though in no way to the disparagement of whatever of good strategy and of quick movement there was on the British side. Several times during the Fall and early Winter campaign, the author thinks, the English should have completely overwhelmed the fluctuating and untrustworthy American Army, but in every instance Howe failed to seize the opportunity.

A primary cause of Washington's regaining a large portion of New Jersey in the first days of January, 1777, was, according to the work in hand, the ruthless military policy of the British commanders. The lukewarm people of that State, who expected protection from the invaders, found their farms overrun, their homes looted, and their valuables carried off by the Hessians or other German troopers. Such friends were worse than enemies led by Washington, who gave in return for country produce and army supplies at least the "promises of Congress to pay" at some future time. Indeed the very composition of the English Army tended to alienate the loyalists, and Washington was politician enough to understand how to make use of his enemies' blunders. Howe, and Cornwallis to a great degree, failed, even to the end of the war, to appreciate how easy it was to drive their American friends into the arms of their revolted neighbors. Wherever their forces marched devastation followed, and the sufferings in one section served as a warning to the others as to what might be expected if an invasion were permitted. Consequently the States which were thought to be most favorable to the royal authority finally offered the most desperate resistance to its re-establishment.

Still a vast number of Americans remained faithful to the King, and when they did not take up arms on behalf of their convictions they led a most miserable life of it. Some went to England, thinking that there they would receive a hearty welcome, but England was too busy to pay them any attention, besides a visitor who comes to spend some years is seldom received with open arms, the less so if the new-comer has but a short purse. Others sought homes in inhospitable Canada and in Nova Scotia, but their lot was sad indeed. They never ceased to regret their exile, and in many cases a last visit to their erstwhile homes was the ambition of their lives, notwithstanding these homes were sometimes held in others, and the land on which they stood had long since been confiscated. The writer's account of all this is sympathetic and extremely interesting.

After recounting in much detail the military and political events of the year 1776 on this side the Atlantic, the author takes the reader back to England at the end of the year and reviews to him the state of things there; the chagrin of the Court at Howe's failures; the disappointment of the majority in Parliament that their policy had so utterly failed, and the half-expressed satisfaction of the great middle class that the Americans had been able to maintain their rights. The important newspapers of the capital were almost unanimously in the opposition; the city government put all manner of obstacles in the way of the press gang who went from town to town forcing young men and boys into the navy. The whole country seemed to be in doubt as to what should be done with the American war. Stocks rapidly declined until British consols sold at a little more than half their face value.

Much is made of John Wesley's testimony, and rightly, for the famous Methodist itinerant knew more people both in America and England than all the politicians connected with the Cabinet knew; he knew, too, the temper of the people on both sides. His advice at first was that the war should not be undertaken; later he risked his popularity by issuing a pamphlet which he thought might lead to some sort of understanding. The result was a storm of abuse and slander; but a man who came nearest to being the real saint of any man of his age knew how to bear obloquy and vituperation.

What may be taken as the most novel part of the work is the chapter which discusses the religious side of the Revolution. Some fifty pages are devoted to this part of the subject. A fresh and entertaining review of the condition of the Colonial churches up to 1776 is followed by a description of the various attempts of the Anglicans to get control of the religious legislation of the country: "Lord Cornbury vested himself with ecclesiastical authority over the whole of New Jersey, and ordained the due performance of the Anglican ritual 'as established by law,' at a time when the colony did not possess a single Church of England Communion. The Episcopalian party was [illegible] in the province of New York, and the [illegible] did not venture to apply for a statute [illegible] of the English Church; but they [illegible] the Dutch Church, and replaced it by an establishment which undertook to provide each city and county with 'a good and sufficient Protestant minister.' And the Royal Governor and his Council in New York thenceforward wrote, spoke, and acted as if the Church of England had been duly and legally enthroned in the colony." (II., 282.)

Similar and even more flagrant usurpations are pointed out in other Colonies. As the years passed, this policy became the more fixed on the part of the English Church at home, and the Cabinet became a party to it. Just prior to the outbreak of the Revolution the colonists generally came to believe that their own churches, founded under so many difficulties by those who, in the main, left England for the sake of religious convictions, were to be undermined and eventually destroyed. It was then not a dissimilar situation to that of the Netherlands at the beginning of the reign of Philip II. That this was such an important issue in America as it had formerly been in the country of William the Silent is not claimed, but it was, nevertheless, important when one recalls that nine-tenths of the colonists were staunch Non-Conformists.

This is indeed an interesting chapter, and its claims, though not altogether new, are completely justified. The Anglicans were making a strong fight to have the Episcopacy established and to bring all the Colonies under one religious head. Baptists were often thrown into prison, Quakers and Methodists fared little better, and the Presbyterians, under the leadership of the College of New Jersey and its able President, Dr. Witherspoon, were sounding the alarm, and altogether there was throughout the war not a little of the religious element injected, though it was hardly a controlling motive in many sections of the country.

The index to Part II. is not good, though this deficiency is in part made up by the topical arrangement of the chapter heads. There is no bibliography, and the citations made in footnotes are not complete. While the body of the book gives every assurance that the writer's investigations covered extensive fields of information, the titles of important sources either fail to appear altogether or are given in such incomplete form that the student who loves to keep tally with his author is rather disappointed. This is, however, no serious impeachment of the accuracy of the work, and, as suggested at the outset, this is a scholarly production, which not only holds the reader's interest fast from beginning to end, but which fills an important place in our literature on the subject—a book which must find a place in every well-stocked library, both public and private.

Parable of Church Unity.

BLISTVILLE. A Tale of Yesterday. By Charles E. Holmes. New York: Charles E. Holmes.

The author and publisher of this little book confesses to a purpose. He says he has desired to get before the public some reflections on things in which he conceives many men and women are interested. And he is of opinion that a story with "enough of incident and narrative to attract attention," is the best vehicle for these reflections. The text may be said to be "Church Unity," and the book is a parable. In a rural town, which he names Blistville, Mr. Holmes has imagined three churches and three parsons—Congregational, Methodist, and Baptist. The churches and the parsons are in the beginning religiously independent, but personally friendly, and all are poor. First the Methodist Church burns down, and since the Methodist flock is unable to rebuild it becomes the guest of the Congregational flock, and presently unites with it. Meantime the Congregational parson is courting the daughter of the Baptist parson, and this love and contact with his desired son's father, a sensible old gentleman, is broadening his previously rather narrow views. The Congregational parson marries the Baptist girl, and then comes a tornado and blows down his church. Whereupon, naturally, his father-in-law offers the courtesies of the Baptist house of worship, which, being substantially built of stone, has escaped the [illegible] to survive. The process of elimination, you observe, has got three congregations into one church, but there are complications resulting from doctrines of close communion. However, a sort of provision for elective baptism solves this, and the Baptist parson, having grown old, is glad to see his son-in-law installed as pastor of "The Blistville United Churches Society." The old gentleman, by the way, has acquired a competency in his years of service, and is content to be pastor emeritus without salary.

Such is the parable. The story deals with the courting of the parson, the machinations of a designing female, a country wedding, church picnics, prayer meetings, discussions on many questions of religion and tolerance, and indulges in the description of a visit to grand opera by a hayseed legislator and rural deacon, who is lulled to the wicked place under the pretext that it is a "meeting house." A benevolent Catholic priest lives on the outskirts and makes comments and suggestions in American Irish idiom.

MORE JUVENILES.

SOMETHING quite new for the little people of books which have readable rhymes and are at the same time small of page bulk. And that is not all, for one is a boy's book, and intended for the small boy to play with while his sister is cutting out her dollies and their frocks. The books are the large thin kind, the type of the best of the colored picture books for children in paper covers. They are called "The Model Book of Dolls" and "The Model Book of Soldiers." They are filled with rhymes which are so good reading as most of those in the little readers' books. The black and white pictures show the children themselves, while the full-page colored illustrations in the one book are the dolls and their clothes and in the other the soldiers, different regiments of gunners, cavalry, infantry, &c.

This is what the boy is to do with his book on a wet day, according to the rhymes:

You take another's scissors—of course, you say "please,"
Then cut out each soldier as he stands all at ease;
But don't go too quickly, for think of his hard
You'd do it you cut off a leg or my arm.

These illustrated pages are perforated on the inside edge, and can be taken out without injuring the book. The soldiers are made with standards, so that after they are cut they will stand.

The illustrations in the little girl's book show six dolls, one to a page, and each doll with a wonderful wardrobe. Sixteen long-tailed gowns, three silk capes, hats, muffs, great bags, parasols, and with a real little Japanese umbrella there is a Japanese parasol. The books cost 25 cents each, and are brought out by E. P. Dutton & Co.

Another large and brilliantly colored book by the same publisher, printed every page upon heavy boards, is "The Children's Animal Show." The domestic animals are shown, and so large that the rabbits are half the size of the cat. It is strictly a picture book with only a few verses on the backs of the first cover page. It is bound in the thick, soft cloth (R.R. Sheets assortment paper-covered books, (E. P. Dutton & Co.) with pictures in colors and the illustrations in black and white, green and white, and brown and white are "The Book of Russia," "The Book of Cuba" and "The Sailors of the World."

A large book, cloth in paper-covered boards is a religious book for the little ones, "God With Us: Bible Stories and Pictures," written by L. E. Wolcott, illustrated by John Lawson, (E. P. Dutton.) There are full-page colored illustrations and sketches in each in the text. Small quarto for the middle-sized little people are "Mother Bunny," by Harriet A. Cheever, and "Daddy Joe's Fiddle," both Dana, Estes & Co. "Pleasant Street, Shilling Valley," by Sarah E. Lee, is a book of short stories, (M. Caldwell Company.) All three of the books are illustrated. A funny little book with funny little pictures, is "India Rubber Jack." The twenty-eight illustrations are by Gerard Sichel, the text by W. C. F. Gunckelman, (E. P. Dutton & Co.) A very interesting little people's book with excellent pictures, is "Wonderfolk in Wonderland." "A Book of Animal Fabled Stories" is written by Edith Guerrier and illustrated with forty-two drawings by Edith Brown, (Boston: Small, Maynard & Co.).

"Jane and John," by Elizabeth Fellows, (Dana, Estes & Co.) has many full illustrations, full-page, colored cuts and boxes of adventures such as come to lively small boys and girls. One morning one was when John peeked into the big boxes and was nearly drowned when the other boys turned on the water. It was Betty Jane who saved him by pulling the hard out of his hands, and it was Jane who thanked God at night for "not letting John under water for ever and ever." "Dodge's Holiday Annual" for 1894 is filled with stories, pictures, and poems, and with nothing else, and other things the children enjoy.

Among the new editions of the season are a couple of books by Nathaniel Hawthorne, "Tanglewood Tales" and "A Wonder Book," with beautiful colored illustrations by H. Granville Fell, (E. P. Dutton & Co.) "The Christ Story," by Eva March Tappan, (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) is a continuous history, beginning with the Annunciation of the coming birth of the Christ Child to the Ascension. The book is a quarto of 400 pages, with many illustrations, mostly from the Holy Land and copies of famous paintings. "The Story of Little David" belongs to the "Famous Children of Literature Series," edited by Frederic Lawrence Knowles, (Dana Estes & Co.) It is a child's story of David Copperfield. "The Show-Book Show," by Howe Walsh, (Dana, Estes & Co.) is a volume of stories within a story. The outside story is a good one in itself, and those about are told in the course of it are also interesting as well as instructive, stories which bring in fact, color and fancy. A Christmas story, called "The Life in Country and Town of Valley," currently by author of "Mrs. Hallam," illustrated by Frank O. Morrill, (The W. A. Wilde Company, Boston and Chicago.) It is a closely printed quarto of 320 pages.

A book which is partly a child's story, and yet from its treatment is fit to merit success as a grown-up story, is "Wonderful Visit," by Elizabeth Gill, (Charles Scribner's Sons.) It is the history of a little girl's visit to relatives and the everyday occurrences, including the coming of a conglomerate of good things which give her unpleasant feelings in her small interior and lead to her being put to bed and finally sent home to her mamma. The illustrations by Beatrice Stevens are as good as the story.

Among the list of the girl's books to appear is a quarto of 310 pages in close print, "Sibyl, or, Old School Friends," by May Baldwin, (F. H. Lippincott.) It is one of the stories for the young girls, a book of much variety and interest, often made with a Duke and a wedding as prompter. "A Gay Charmer," by Laura T. Meade, also published by Lippincott, is a better book than its name implies. The heroine of the book and who gives it its name is a sweet, bright young girl, and the story is the history of the softening of a quicker girl from jealousy and its ugly accompaniments.

"Aunt Jenny's Will," by Mabel Osgood Wright, illustrated by Florence Scovell Shinn, (The Macmillan Company,) and "Jill's Bad Bear," Amy Le Feuvre, (Fleming H. Revell Company,) are two other excellent stories for young people. "Shelia" is a sad little human nature tale by Anna Chapin Ray, (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co) It is a story of "the other half," and a very good story, too. "Elsie and Her Loved Ones," by Martha Finley, (Dodd, Mead & Co.) is a story which brings in good morals and stories of the history of this country.

In "With Flintlock and Fife" Everett T. Tomlinson begins a Colonial series following the Revolutionary series of five books by the already written. The book deals with the battle of Lake George, bringing in exciting events of the period in the startling beginning the French and Indians. It is illustrated by Frank O. Small, (W. A. Wilde Company, Boston and Chicago.) "True Blue, a Story of Lock and Flock," by Mildred A. Mills, Dana Estes & Co., starts with from the adventure stories of boys. There is a wealthy banker who becomes through shrewd speculation an American and Shopkeeper, and a son who surprises far with the aid of detectives, and this gives opportunity for plenty of interesting detail. "Two Boys and a Dog" is a trustworthy and thrilling story, and "The Village Champion" is one of W. O. Stoddard's books of school life. It is a 300-page quarto, and the pictures give an idea of the contents. The frontispiece shows "Pat Murphy's Trap," a number of boys in swimming, and undressed for the water, with Mr. Murphy fully dressed joining them unexpectedly. Another picture shows the doctor's letter in the academy with the bell rope tied to her horse. George W. Jacobs & Co., Philadelphia, are the publishers.

"The Story of Siegfried," by Dr. Edward Brooks, (The Penn Publishing Company,) is something new in the ranks for young people. It is a fully illustrated quarto of 272 pages. The longer story, which gives the title to the book, is followed by "The Story of the Nibelungs." The author has made an interesting tale, weaving a little fancy with the dull tales from the "Nibelungenlied." The pictures are spirited. "The Little Lady of the Fort," by Annie H. Ryder, (The Penn Publishing Company,) is an interesting, well-written story of the days of the struggle between the French and Iroquois in the Canadas. The illustrations are by Frank Wood.

There are any number of adventures and plenty of "Indians" in "In the Camp of the Crooks," by Louis Pendleton, (Penn Publishing Company.) The pictures show the exciting nature of the text. There is a short historical account of the "Battle of Chickamauga" at the end, but most of the history in the book is confined to the pictures.

"A Quaker Soldier," by Evelyn Raymond, illustrated by Ida Wright, is one of the books which belong to the old series of Raymond, there are quite enough of them brought out at the present time. There are the inseparable disagreements between rich relatives and the little country girl, the time after the Quaker soldiers with the inevitable meet of the good qualities in the book. The rich relatives have their money, the poor relatives become rich, but every one is happy at the end of the book and there are exciting incidents and experiences in carrying the take "Pudding Jacket" by Mandie Allen, Jr., in Director of the old time Quaker, this has for the boys. The good boy is unbearably clever and comes out ahead under all disadvantages, while the bad boy persists all over and kinds of mean tricks of character and is crushed at the end. "In Alaskan Waters" is another of the old-timers, but this will, as usual, number of boys who will enjoy it. There is the robbery of a bank messenger, the robbery of the bank, and suspicion falls on the bankers nephew and son. These young men have interesting adventures around the country while the story is gradually straightening itself out. People who believe in the straightening of all the morals may not object to the story, for the boys, upon the advice of a substantial friend, after a slippery and dangerous adventure, to go upon returning them their money, because it is the quickest way to get the money and it is impossible to do the same into the hands of the proper authorities. The three books are brought out by the Penn Publishing Company.

THE GEORGIAN ERA.

A Selection from the Correspondence of Thomas Creevey, M. P.*

AROUND Thomas Creevey there revolves an extensive circle of which figure many important personages of the last 100 years. Creevey was a member of Parliament. You may read the chronicles of his times from his entrance into Parliament up to the time of his death, in 1838, and not be aware that Creevey ever had an interest. But as his biographer, Sir Herbert Maxwell expressed it:

"Nevertheless it is given to certain men of subordinate importance in their day to be perpetual lenses in correct focus, or, more purely, in their journals, as to leave upon the side in after years small sign, the venerable dress and, at times, the faded pages, an impression of their personality so vivid as to convince him of the writers' character and motives.

Creevey was born in Liverpool in 1768. With the help of the Duke of Norfolk, he represented Thetford, one of the Duke's pocket boroughs. Creevey married the Widow Ord. It was his step-daughter, Miss Elizabeth, to whom Creevey addressed many of his letters. He had, too, a way of keeping all his correspondence. More than that, he conceived the idea of writing something like a history of his times. He did not carry this through, however, though there are many pages of a daily journal kept by him. It is from these letters and other authentic data that Sir Herbert Maxwell has constructed the Creevey papers. With good judgment the compiler of the volume has left out much which is unnecessary, for he is right when he says: "What the modern reader is most likely to enjoy are the gossips of a bygone day, sidelights on the politics of the late Georgian era, and traits and illustrations of personages in public life." Creevey was admirably equipped as a newspaper. Charles Greville, who stands in judgment over everybody, assesses himself favorably concerning Creevey's ability. The first item of importance is a letter note from Charles Grey (afterward Earl Grey) to Mrs. Ord, the date of which is Jan. 24, 1798. He wrote:

I have only a moment before the post goes out. . . . As account is come that the King of France was executed on Monday morning. Everything in Paris bore the appearance of another Danton and Marat. . . . I thought I cannot exaggerate the horror I feel at this atrocity. . . . War is certain, and God great we may not all repent the consequences of it!

New followed some years of war with France. When there was for a time an end of hostilities, Paris was visited by many leading Englishmen. Creevey describes Napoleon's first wife:

Mme. Buonaparte is a woman of nearly fifty, of singular good temper, and without a little intrigue. She is a Creole, and has large West Indian possessions. On these last accounts it was that she was married to the Vicomte de Beauharnais—a lively anecdote about the old Court, and both in his life and since his death his wife maintained a great favorite in Paris. . . . Mme. de Sousa says no one but Mme. Buonaparte could live with the Consul; he is subject to fits of passion bordering on insanity, and on the appearance of one of these distempered freaks of his he is left by all about him to be late and to the wrong side of time. . . . Mme. de Sousa says his wife's forbearance . . . that she can possibly contrive to have the respect she feels with him.

. . . Oh, this wicked Pavilion! We were there till half past 1 this morning, and it was 3 ere I had a headache which I have to-day. . . . When the Prince appeared I instantly saw that he had got more wine than usual, and it was still more evident that the German Baron was extremely drunk. The Prince came up and sat by me . . . and talked a great deal about Mrs. Fitzherbert.

In the Autumn of 1814 Creevey took his wife to Brussels. The lady was in bad health. This portion of Creevey's journal is of singular interest, as he was on terms of intimacy with the Duke of Wellington. Some short time before the return of Napoleon from Elba the Duke of Wellington was at an assembly held at Lady Caroline Greville's house, when Creevey broached the possible effects of Napoleon's presence in France. Creevey writes:

We had much conversation about Buonaparte, and the Duke would have it that a Bourbon was the thing which he was fit to be set up at Paris—that it would never come to fighting with the Allies—that the Republic would be all settled by Carnot (Actg. Buonaparte, he—that was my guess) or it would be a Bourbon. I go he and I had a good deal of talking, and I asked him what he thought the old man-ager Buonaparte would say to this new move, and whether it was with his consent it was got up, and whether it would in truth turn out a tragedy or farce. He said he had no doubt it would be a tragedy to Buonaparte, and that they would hang him by stilette or otherwise in a very few weeks.

When later on came the news of Napoleon's advance toward Belgium, there there was terror in Brussels. Thackeray may have written the stampede of the English residents of Brussels from hearsay only, but for all that we receive an accurate idea of what it was like. Wellington knew of Napoleon's advance when, on the 15th of June, he was present at that famous ball at Brussels given by the Duchess of Richmond. Napoleon was in Paris on the 12th of the month, and did not cross the frontier before the 15th. Creevey was not present at the ball, but his step-daughters were. Creevey writes:

I stayed at home with Mrs. Creevey. About 11 on at night I heard a great bustling at home in my street. . . . and we of course jump out of bed to see what the play was. . . . I then found out that the Prince had been driven out of Charleroi. The Duke was at the ball, and received the intelligence there, and had sent off his different orders. There had been plenty of officers at the ball, and some trifling extract had taken place upon the subject parting with them.

After Waterloo and Wellington's return to Brussels, Creevey at once went to the Duke's headquarters, and looking up at a window, saw Wellington beckoning to him. The account of what the Duke said may be considered as authentic. Later on, in 1828, Wellington remembered Creevey's interview with him. Creevey's account is as follows:

The first thing I did was to put out my hand and congratulate him upon his victory. He made a sufficiently observation in his short, natural, blunt way, but with the greatest gravity all the time and without the least approach to anything like triumph or joy. "I have had a hard battle to fight, I can tell you," he said. "Bitcher and I have lost 15,000 men. It has been a damned sharp thing—the hardest thing I ever was in in my life. Blucher was (Lord) knocked out on Friday night, and got on dreadfully bruised. I could not find him on Saturday; so I was obliged to call back to keep up my communications with him."

Sir Herbert Maxwell notes that after the stern criticism of war "home politics and social gossip read flat enough." The past and the present contrast strangely when we see how the matter of railways were treated in 1828. Then the "[illegible]" magnates looked with horror on the designs of railway engineers, and [illegible] every way to block all progress. Creevey calls the whole business an "infernal nuisance," and brought against "the Locomotive Monster carrying eighty tons of goods and navigated by a tail of smoke and sulphur, ousting thro' every man's grounds between Manchester and Liverpool." Later on he tells Miss Ord "this devil of a railway is struggled at last." Toward the close of his life Creevey had several places given him under the Government. A glance at the index shows that these were few of the distinguished men of Creevey's time he was not well acquainted with.

Railroading in the West.

To people whom ideas of railroading consist of riding in the smoker or the Pullman palace car, Frank H. Spearman's book ought to be instructive as well as interesting. To be sure, there is a great deal of technical talk that the amateur reader will have to take with a large faith, but on the whole the stories he tells of the bravery, the daring, the fine judgment of the men whose brains have planned the intrigue and the tracks, as well as whose steady hands and keen eyes have held the engine in check, will probably be as interesting without knowledge of technicalities as with it. "The Daughter of a Magnate" is really one continued story, through which runs the thread of a love comedy; but it might just as well have been chopped up into any number of short stories and the love thread snapped completely without losing an iota of the interest or strength of the stories; for, to tell the truth, Mr. Spearman is far more at ease when describing a run in a caboose in the teeth of a mighty blizzard such as only comes up in the West than he is when describing the lovely blush on a maiden's cheek as "he (her lover) heard from her lips the maddening sweetness of his boy name . . . 'Ab'." He, the lover, loses force during these scenes of billing and cooing. He is a much mightier figure when on the plain mountain engineer he dares all his strength and his mental forces against the vastness of nature; brows out the cheek of a mountain that first cars may reach their destination without delay; organizes a searching party for a friend lost in the snow and too among the frozen crevices and caverns. The code of the railroad man's life is as rigid as a soldier's.

. . . A hundred times and in a hundred ways we gamble with death and laugh if we cheat it, and our poor reward is only congratulations to win where far better men have failed. So in this railroad life two stand, . . . hand in hand, the lifelong storm of fair weather, together. And death speaks for one; and whichever he calls it is over the other must answer. And this is duty!

Turned with pluck and hearted heartily with the work, the engine, with each her prey, quivering under the last pound of steam she could carry, and hissing with it, in a delirium of fling her back again and again upon the rattle, the last engine moved down on the blocked out.

Unable to retrace distance or resistance, but by instinct and forced to stay where they were, Jimmy McGrew pricked up cylinders till the amazing engine roared. Then crouching like a jockey for a final cruel spur he loaded the monster for the fight and rose to his stirrups for the great.

With never a slip or a stumble, hardly yielding in her goddess frame, the straining engine pulled headlong into the curve. Only once she staggered and reled; once only three reckless men rose to answer death as it knocked at their hearts, but their hands, like her cobs, and the engine straighted, stanted, and parted the flying drift from out to and.

Thus they cut through a herd of sheep blocking the tracks and crossing in the dense gales of a driving blizzard.

"Water Motors."

In a pamphlet entitled "Water Motors," issued by the Henry R. Worthington Company, their new disk pump is described and illustrated with cuts showing the internal construction. The design, which matter is also described, as well as the Worthington hot-water motor, which is considered an essential part of an engine-driven pump for boiler feeding. The pamphlet is 6½ by 9 inches, and is printed on good heavy paper. It will be sent on request to any reader interested in water motors.

CALENDARS.

Artistic and Useful Ornaments of the Season.

FEWER calendars this year than usual bear the imprint of private printers, who on former occasions put forth some of their finest efforts in the expression of more or less artistic pictorial data for the coming year. Probably they have been too ardently confined to bookmaking to devote any of their time and energy to these pretty tablets of Father Time. There seems also to be a falling off in the number of calendars usually issued by those general publishers to whom one annually looks; here, although the quality remains on a par with former achievements, there is a noticeable absence of what arrests the attention for its striking originality. Are people getting weary of these pretty tokens of the Christmastide and the New Year? One thing is certain, however, the gaudy, meaningless calendar, together with the equally gaudy and meaningless Christmas card, has quite passed away, or no longer intrudes.

Quite the most conspicuous among the privately printed calendars which have come to our hands is a series of oblong Japan handmade paper sheets, bearing upon the cover, in an excellent woodcut design, appropriate and artistic, the following legend: "A Calendar of Prayers by Robert Louis Stevenson—Done in Boston for Alfred Bartlett and to be Had from Him at His Attick in Cornhill." The sheets, which are 5 by 15 inches, have in the upper two-thirds quotations from the author appropriate to the season, in its natural or human and psychological aspects. These are entitled "At Morning," "Separation," "For Favor," &c. Below is the month's record in weeks and days. All is inclosed in a delicate vine design upon a black background. Rubricated initial letters strikingly set off the general sombreness of the designs and printing. (Boston: Alfred Bartlett, 69 Cornhill. $1.50.)

"The Audubon Calendar" is one which will surely appeal to those who are interested in our native birds. It consists of twelve cards presenting on their faces reproductions of some of the more familiar birds in color, while on the backs are pertinent extracts from such books as "The Land Birds and Game Birds of New England," by H. D. Minot. The calendar is published under the auspices of the Audubon Society of Massachusetts. (Springfield, Mass.: Taber-Prang Art Company.)

As usual, E. P. Dutton & Co. present a large assortment of calendars of many varieties. Now, as formerly, their most striking pieces of artistic color work, such as the reproduction of paintings, are the work of Bavarian colorists and engravers. "The Secret of Happiness" has an attractive cover design, together with thirteen turn-over leaves, each containing bold illuminated texts on Happiness transcribed from well-known philosophical poets—Jean Ingelow, Emilio Castelar, and others. ($1.25.) "A Paris Calendar" contains twelve turn-over leaves, each revealing a scene from active Parisian life depicted in colors. These scenes are full of life and movement—entirely free from conventionality and with, now and then, a touch of irony or of caricature. ($1.25.) The "Peace Be With You Calendar" consists of four turn-over leaves, with full-length figures of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, beautifully reproduced in cathedral window borders and rich in greens, purples, orange, and gold. With the tablets of the months are presented appropriate Biblical quotations. ($1.50.) "Little Lovers" consists of three hanging Japanese plates of pretty Japanese girls suspended from a long tablet on which has been printed the calendar proper in simple yet pretty designs. (35 cents.) Another pretty calendar—one almost as cheap in price—is "Old-Time Memories." This is made of twelve turn-over leaves, with pictures of child life representing play at the various seasons of the year. The coloring while elementary is very distinct. (50 cents.)

Two attractive block calendars from the same publishers are "Phillips Brooks" and "Robert Louis Stevenson," with selections for every day from the works of the preacher and poet respectively. Each bears small medallion portraits. That of the late Bishop Brooks is shown in a Florentine frame, from a background of goldenrod. Besides the monthly data and the quotations on the leaves of the block there is printed on the back of the tablet much useful information concerning the coming year—religious, ecclesiastical, and astronomical. (50 cents each.)

There are a few new designs to be noticed among Bavarian importations. Chief among these are the reproductions of sacred portraits from the old masters. In "Gloria in Excelsis" we have two groups of Fra Angelico angels, beautifully colored and reproduced on heavy cards, with a hanger containing the calendar proper. On the cover of the hanger is a reproduction of the "Madonna della Sedia." (12 by 16 inches, $1.50.) "His Name Shall Be Called Wonderful" contains a familiar Madonna with child and St. John, flanked by figures of Sts. Peter and Paul—all smoothly and richly colored. The calendar is suspended by a ribbon. (60 cents.) In this same [illegible] popular last year, makes its reappearance at E. P. Dutton & Co.'s, with the chronicle of months, weeks, and days for 1904. It presents a series of reproduced water color pictures descriptive of quite unfamiliar Venetian scenes or old scenes viewed from a new point of vantage. Among others are "The Doge's Palace," "Church of San Marco," with the pigeons, and the "Maria Della Salute." The artist is far removed from the conventional both in selection of subjects and in execution. Moreover, he has made his pictures at times when the atmospheric effects were quite uncommon. ($2.)

Children are well remembered in the calendars of this year presented by Messrs. Dutton, and besides the innumerable cards, leaflets, and dainty booklets for the new year, are several calendars which are intended to inspire true artistic influences. "The Snowball Calendar" shows the days of the month in prettily arranged snowballs against a background of holly and childish faces. (60 cents.) There is also "Our Baby's Calendar," with infant faces in blue. (60 cents.)

In those publications which are on the border line between literature and artistic ornaments for the coming year are several handsome booklets, quite conspicuous among them being a delightful reprint of Bishop Brooks's "Little Town of Bethlehem." Only three or four verses being given on a page, plenty of room has been availed of for the illustrations and border designs which make together a very appropriate and thoroughly artistic little Christmas token. There are also little publications, such as "The Joyful Year," "Words of Hope," "Dainty Messenger," "The Bright Year," and "The Star of Hope," not to mention an innumerable number of Christmas souvenirs, both ornamental and useful, ranging in kind from needle cases to pinballs.

Quite the most striking calendar issued by E. P. Dutton & Co. is entitled "Characters from Fiction," ($5.00.) It consists of large bristol board mats, on which have been mounted twelve colored pictures representing "Mr. Micawber," "Jos. Sedley," "Mrs. Gamp," "Decimus Saxon," "Baillie Nicol Jarvie," "Dominie Sampson," "Mr. Pecksniff," "Tony Lumpkin," "John Silver," "Mrs. Malaprop," "The Three Musketeers," and "Meg Merrilies." The artist is Monroe F. Orr, who works in a style originated by William Nicholson, but more imaginative, less dependent upon heavy black outlines, and possibly more artistic. Besides, Mr. Orr employs a greater variety of elementary colors and his contrasts are less sharp, and a commendable effort has been made in toning, particularly in flesh tints. His costuming is historically correct, and his figures in face and pose are quite as much types of humanity as of literary creations.

The calendars which come from the Frederick A. Stokes Company usually represent much that is admirable in native American talent. Gelett Burgess, the creator of the once famous purple cow, tries his hand at verse as well as at pictures on a series of salmon-colored sheets called the "Goop Calendar." ($1.) The Goops seem to be a family of very naughty and mirthful children, with round heads and curved limbs constructed after Mr. Burgess's familiar style. The figures are, of course, monstrosities, but the attitudes are thoroughly natural and human. The verse runs along in the following doggerel fashion:

> The Goops, they lick their fingers,
> And the Goops, they lick their knives;
> Oh, they lead disgusting lives!

Florence England Nosworthy, who is well known for creating types of American feminine beauty, presents this year in the form of a calendar half a dozen large drawings in color entitled "The Girl," ($1.25.) Several types of beauty are represented—blonde, brunette, brown, &c.—and the figures are all décolletée or with draped shoulders, and all the heads support enormous hats. These hats are not only wonders of millinery achievement, but of artistic adaptation as well. In other words, the artist has taken certain millinery characteristics of the various seasons and has emphasized them in a possibly impracticable but thoroughly artistic manner. The coloring is good and emphatic and the drawing always free and graceful. A more realistic collection of beauties is seen in the calendar entitled "American Beauties," ($1.50.) This represents in six light-brown sepia tinted photogravure reproductions of photographic presentments of charming female types. The plates are so mounted that they may be readily framed. Elizabeth F. Bonsall this year presents six colored drawings representing cats in various attitudes and in various positions of play. Her calendar is quite naturally designated "The Cat," ($1.25.) Another calendar in which Tabby appears, but not alone, is one called "The Girl and the Cat," ($2.) which presents half a dozen finely executed crayon drawings by Clarence F. Underwood. These pictures are something more than mere groupings of Tabbies and their fair mistresses. The artist evidently strove not only to show contrasts in color, in fur, and in flesh, but also in cat nature and human nature. First comes the "Girl and the White Angora"; this has two representations, and in both cases the human figure in the picture is handsomely gowned in jet black. Another effective picture shows a handsome young woman in full white ball dress caressing an inky black cat. Another, quite as charming, shows a girl in a décolletée dinner gown watching a mother cat and her kittens at play.

through photographs in calendar display Messrs. Stokes present a collection which should attract a variety of tastes. One interesting thing about their actress calendars is that they have taken pains to secure unfamiliar pictures. The "Mrs. Leslie Carter Calendar," ($1.50,) represents this actress in six poses—three from "Du Barry," two from "Zaza," and one from "The Heart of Maryland." The pictures are large, are handsomely mounted, and the toning in every case is most excellent. Then comes the calendar of "American Actresses," ($1.50,) representing in clear-cut half tones on heavy calendered paper Julie Opp, Elizabeth Tyree, Cecilia Loftus, Margaret Anglin, Bonnie Maginn, and Minnie Ashley. This forms a charming collection of unfamiliar poses and expressions of more or less familiar female idols of the American stage.

The dog fancier has not been forgotten by Messrs. Stokes this season. They present in a series of six plates, labeled "A Calendar of Prize Winners," ($1.50,) photographic reproductions which are evidently barking and growling likenesses of the originals. Among these "prize winners," whose names, unfortunately, are not given, are a bull terrier, a bulldog, and two distinct types of poodle. The pictures have been effectively made through photographic treatment of parchment paper.

"The League Calendar," issued by the Good Citizenship League of Flushing, N. Y., consists of a number of leaves suspended by rings from a rod. The cover is a graceful, conventionalized holly design. The leaves, one for every week, opening with an appropriate quotation from Phillips Brooks's "Symmetry of Life," continue for every day in the year, with suggestive and moral citations from the poets and prose writers, especially adapted for the season or for the various needs of human sensibilities. (38 Jamaica Avenue, Flushing, N. Y., $1.)

NORTHERN CANADA.

Climbing and Exploration in the Canadian Rockies.*

A CENTURY ago, and even less than that, the Rocky Mountain region of the Dominion of Canada was almost unknown, for the reason that access to it was difficult. Even to-day, with a railway connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific, there are many parts of the country still unvisited. In the volume entitled "Climbing and Exploration in the Canadian Rockies," Mr. Hugh E. M. Stutfield and Mr. J. Norman Collie give their experiences in the "Great Lone Land." In the first chapter the early explorations are explained, and due credit given to Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who in 1793 crossed the continent at the high latitudes. Up to 1887 little that was accurate was known of the mountain districts lying 100 miles to the north or south of the railway. It was in 1898 that Mr. McEvoy measured the mountain known as Robson's Peak and found it to be 13,500 feet high. The authors say: "This peak for the present, therefore, is the highest that has been accurately surveyed in the Rocky Mountains of Canada."

It must be due to unconscious exaggeration that, like fishermen, mountain climbers increase pounds or feet. A more careful study of many of the mountains shows that there have been errors of thousands of feet, and some of the 16,000 and 17,000 feet have to come down a great deal. One of the mountains scaled by the writers of the work was "The Dome." ...

OUR NAVY.

Ex-Secretary John D. Long's Account of Its Recent Development.

THE Forty-seventh Congress, during its session of 1881-2 and 1882-3—twenty years ago—authorized the construction of three steel cruisers and one steel dispatch boat. These three vessels were the kernel of the new American Navy; the development of which in years has potently added to the upbuilding of many industries of the Nation, and the achievements of which in war vied in glory and results with those of the mighty fighting vessels of the early days of the Nation's life.

When the keels of these four vessels were laid, the American Navy was inferior to that of any European, and at least one South American power. Louis Otto, triumphant over Peru, could have sent her President Cochrane and Huascar against San Francisco, and the United States would have been unable to repel them.

Our entire naval list at that time showed five wooden steam vessels classed as first-rates, which had been built twenty-five years before, and which were obsolete and practically useless as man-of-war; twenty-seven second-rates, of which three only were afloat, rotten and worthless, seven were to ordinary, and the rest, not any one were actually in condition for sea duty; twenty-nine third-rate steam vessels, of which fifteen only were valuable for naval purposes; six fourth-rate sailing vessels, none of which was of account as a warship; twenty-two sailing vessels, but five of which could ever navigate the sea; twenty-four cumbersome and antiquated iron-clads, and two torpedo boats, which have long since proved impracticable, and which were sold for junk. In this entire fleet of 142 vessels, but 48 were even capable of carrying guns and fighting in the defense of the country. On none of them was there a single high-power long-range rifled gun!

To-day the navy of the United States comprises 172 steel ships, 39 of which are battleships of the first and 1 a battleship of the second class; 26 armored cruisers, 1 armored ram, 20 monitors (iron and steel,) 20 protected and unprotected cruisers, 46 gunboats, and 35 torpedo craft. The cost of these ships approximates $170,000,000. Since the war with Spain it has steadily strengthened the hold which it already had on popular sentiment. Its brilliant record during that struggle, its substantial consummation of the war by the unprecedented thoroughness of its victories at Manila and Santiago, the patriotic and successful achievements of its civilian officials in its marvelous organization, no less than the splendid exploits of its fighting men, have stimulated the feeling of National interest in it and dependence upon it. Its history during the short twenty years of its existence already possesses the romantic interest that attaches to the glorious days of the Commonwealth, the Constitution, the Constellation, the Essex, and the Enterprise.

What such a history has to tell is admirably set forth by ex-Secretary of the Navy John D. Long in the preface to his volume, in which he says:

> There has been an attempt not so much to make a picturesque story as to give an idea of the work done in the last half dozen years, in essential terms by shorter form of Congressional reports, secretaries of the Navy, by naval officers and others; also of the many arts that enter into the construction, armament and equipment of a modern man-of-war; of the organization and administration of the various bureaus of the Navy Department, the great home navy yards, the stations, the shifting life of all on shipboard, and of the achievements by which officers and sailors may have added or much more to the already shining record of the American navy.
> Very likely a milkman would better read all these copies than a civilian. The latter, however, if he be distracted with the great world of business, may be a lover of his own calling. As Secretary of the Navy from the 5th of March, 1897, to the 1st of May, 1902, I had an opportunity to be impressed with the fine spirit, the patriotic impulse, the scientific and mechanical attainments, the courage, devoting, and service of the men of the navy. . . . Associated with them I felt that the navy was a power as a mighty arm upholding the country, for country rather than from that association regard them with enlightened admiration and confidence.

Obviously no naval historian could be better equipped for the work as regards access to data than one who for five years had exercised the direction of its expansion, organization, equipment, and energies. It is quite evident that a considerable part of Mr. Long's volume was written while he was actually at the head of the department during a time when the new navy was receiving its baptism in blood.

There are many facts in it which are fresh in the minds of the newspaper reading public, but through it all there's information that only a department official could tell us and an authority and understanding that will give it an almost unique value as a record of one of the most interesting periods in the country's history.

Mr. Long has not had to go very far back in the department records for his facts regarding the birth of the new navy—only as far as the administration of President Arthur and the shortsighted economy of efforts of the patriotic new Washington officials to rehabilitate the naval arm of the service, which had fallen into a lamentable condition, are among the most interesting in the volume.

President Arthur, in his first message to Congress, said: "I cannot too strongly urge upon you my conviction that every consideration of National safety, economy, and honor imperatively demands the thorough rehabilitation of the navy."

Secretary of the Navy Hunt reinforced this utterance by stating in his annual report that it was a "source of mortification to our officers and fellow-countrymen generally that our vessels of war should stand in such sorry contrast alongside of those of inferior powers. The construction of the beginnings of a new navy certainly becomes an imperative necessity."

As a result of these representations, a Naval Advisory Board was formed, which, strangely enough, managed for a time overcoming the stiffness of steel over iron in naval construction. In 1882 the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs recommended steel as "the only proper material for the construction of vessels of war."

As the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress an act was passed, and approved March 3, 1883, providing for the construction of four vessels:

> The ships constructed under this act were the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and Dolphin. In the war with Spain the Chicago and Atlanta were undergoing repairs; the Boston participated with other ships of Dewey's command in effecting the destruction of Spanish squadron; the Dolphin, last, and the Dolphin, performed thousands service in Cuban waters. These vessels exercised, however, a far more important influence upon the subject of naval construction in war. Their construction marked the renunciation of the old policy of the United States of providing itself with the best weapons of war, and gave conspicuous practical assurance of protection in its future operations and exploitation, and American citizens proving to foreign lands.

It was not until 1887, however, that the last of these four vessels was put into commission, and the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, with the Yorktown of later date, formed the famous White Squadron, which twelve years ago visited Europe and gave the maritime nations of that continent visual knowledge of the possession by the United States of modern steel-war.

It seems strange at this time to read of the hesitation and disapproval among Congressmen, and even of naval experts, scarcely more than a decade ago over such innovations as twin screws, compound engines, and steel plating in warships, but Secretary of the Navy William E. Chandler overrode virulent criticism in calling for bids on which the first vessels of the new navy were constructed.

A number of chapters in Col. Long's history is devoted to the gradual advance made in construction and equipment. The struggles with Congress in the matter of appropriations, the gradual evolution of the typical American man-of-war under the naval administrations of Secretaries Whitney, Tracy, and Herbert, constitute one of the most interesting and valuable features of the volume.

With the chapter on "Preparation for the War with Spain," Mr. Long enters the domain of personal reminiscence, and his work assumes the authority and interest of the narrative of a well mediated enthusiast. The main points of his narrative of that struggle are fresh in the public mind, and the reader of Mr. Long's volume will find in it few very important facts connected with the Spanish-American war as covered from "the inside" that have escaped the public press. But the history of a war, extend several thousand miles at a high tax, leaves many side lights to be supplied, and these the ex-Secretary has furnished to round out and complete the final record of the first great campaign of the new American navy. He has performed the historian's task—every word of which shows it to have been a labor of love—with a thoroughness that has left few of the actors in the drama unmentioned or even without a word of praise. Almost impartially and with an apparently unconscious skill the author has, with a sometimes hard, a reticence there, throughout a long and detailed narrative of the stirring events of 1897 and 1898, drawn a fine and enduring portrait of President McKinley. No obvious attempt is made anywhere in the narrative to characterize, but there is a kindly spirit of appreciation touching nearly every prominent figure in the war.

Writing of Theodore Roosevelt's career as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Long says:

> His entire conduct was such more than the President or the department approved. Just before the war, when the Spanish battleship was on its way here, he on well on some point of difficulty, I think it was a case of war, delayed something, I forgot, I was to meet it without waiting for a more formal declaration of war. He wanted information, and I gave it. He wanted information which he would place every morning on my desk. Most of his suggestions had, however, so far as applicable, been already adopted by the various bureaus, the Chief, equipped with the pressing every nerve and leaving nothing not done. When I suggested to him that some future historian reading his memoranda, if they were put on record, would get the impression that the bureaus were insufficient, he answered, laughingly, with the generous good nature which is so marked in him, indeed, nothing could be pleasanter than our relations. He was hard and good in his work. His typewriting had no rest. It was the pest of us, made the rare knock of quality; he was especially stimulating to the younger officers who gathered about him and made his office as busy as a hive.

It is no disparagement of Mr. Long's volume to say that it could have been made as valuable as a historical work in about half its present length. Prolixity is not always an abstract fault, however, and the work is easily the most readable, as well as the most complete and authoritative history of the new American Navy.

SPORT IN SCANDINAVIA.

For years Scandinavia has been the recreation ground of the Englishman. Mr. R. B. Kennedy's volume is written for those "who, by reason of being much engaged at home, crave off for their short yearly holiday." As a thorough sportsman, the author will tell them where they may go to find the salmon, the trout, or the grouse. Then, too, there is hunting game, the deer, the elk, the bear, and, besides, there are the scenic magnificence of natural surroundings. It may be cold at times, but then the stranger ought to know what are climatic conditions. It is precisely this longing to which below the man who makes a holiday. You need not, unless you please, scale the mountain heights, for there are countless valleys, away above the level of the sea, which abound with spoil "both for the hunter and the naturalist." It is to Scandinavia that to-round the largest glacier in Europe, for the Jostedal Glacier has a length of sixty miles and covers an area of 300 square miles.

Mr. Kennedy tells of his first fishing trip in Norway and how he was nearly frozen, losing all his fishing tackle, with his gun. But the second expedition made him forget his early mishap. Arriving at a good-sized river, it was in vain that the guide observed: "Too cold, too low waters." One angler had been interpreted for the highest authority that the salmon of that river would only take a coloured fly. The reputation here was then used. There was no result. Two two long hours the casting took place. Here is some good advice imparted by the author: "If salmon will not take the regular flies that are put over them give them something strange—a regular stopper. This will sometimes, not always, bring them."

In the far north there was found a mountain torrent with a fall of 800 feet, and Mr. Kennedy writes: "Shed your enemy to see the fall if he will go, but keep out of his way if he lives to come back." Once among the Lapps, Mr. Kennedy built a good sized hut, for he was accompanied by his wife. One year he advertised it, and among the conditions was the following: "How many servants slept in my house? How far off the nearest church, Post Office, telegraph, doctor, butcher, dentist, and undertaker?" This was the reply:

> I answered that the big hut took care of the nearest church, Hammerfest, having twice a year, on the Lapps informed me; Post Office, by mail; doctor, the butcher, the nearest Lapp who could render; undertaker—well, I could not say. I forgot that he could go as I did, hand his shirts to a boat about to the hut with his mates on charge and carry them out, and, lo, all this was a complete joke. The Lapps I promised my inquiry he were back in a day that. "It was an enemy, was not that, I did not forgetting that joke in doubt."

Mr. Kennedy does not hold the snoring in favor. "The fish," he writes, "has a mouth as tough as leather, and that his fight is of the coldest." There were another of amateur greyhound sleigh in Lapland, but a fish of about 8 pounds seemed to be the maximum. One biggest American gray-line water fly pounds. All fishermen know that the distance from a well circumvents the entanglement. There has been much curiosity regarding the annual size of Scandinavian trout. In Sweden, there may be most photographs of trout, said to have weighed 20 pounds. Mr. Kennedy saw a number of biggest trout, which the anglers, who were fishermen, declared weighed from 14 to 18 pounds when the fish were alive. The biggest trout that the author ever saw killed, was taken in the Jostedal, and weighed 24 pounds, and that great fish stood at the end of the season. The size of the salmon in Norway was less than those captured in the North American rivers. Mr. Kennedy, who has seen all sorts of angling, writes in glowing terms of an American fisherman he met, and he writes: "He was about the best master of the art I have ever met."

Scandinavian hunting dogs, when used for small game, have their peculiarities. Sportsmen put a collar around the neck of the dogs, and the man with the gun is so tugged to his birds. The sense of smell in these dogs is marvelous. The author stalks the reindeer and the elk, and occasionally goes for bear. Once when tracking a bear, there was some pick run from the carcass to cold. Finally a shelter was constructed, and the guide brought forth sausages. Mr. Kennedy with a sharp appetite attacked the sausages provided by the guide. "I never knew you had sausages," remarked the author. "They taste very good." "Yes," replied the man, "they are made from that favorite horse your wife used to ride in former days. Ja, he was very fat."

Of the peasants Mr. Kennedy writes in the highest terms:

> Honest they are in every sense of the word. Clothes, money, guns, ammunition, sleighs and everything, may be left year after year at their farms, and every person upon the return of the stranger these things will be found to have been put away carefully, ready for his advent. Did he not return for years they would be as safe.

ADVERTISING.

Walter Dill Scott's Theory of Its Principles on a Psychological Basis.

EVERY business man who advertises, and every business man who has neglected to advertise and wishes to advertise wisely, will be persuaded to become a student of psychology after he has read this very readable and instructive volume. On the second page of the first chapter he may be startled by the announcement that it is estimated that $500,000,000 is expended annually for the United States for advertising, and that 95 per cent. of the cost cannot be expended superfluously. Not because there are not some skilled advertising men and newspapers and magazines, having the most intelligent and appreciative of readers and having at command also the services of the best writers of advertisements, but largely because much of the advertising, perhaps most of it, was unpleasant, unattractive, unimaginative, repetitious, and uninteresting. Prof. Scott believes, and gives the reasons for his belief, that advertising, to be effective, must be constructed and designed with reference to the conditions and habits of the average human mind, and only through an understanding of psychology, the science of mental states, can a stable foundation be laid for a theory of advertising. Having published most of the chapters of the book in magazine form, and as contained the attention of many advertisers, he has had the gratification of observing many efforts to apply the psychological theory, with accompanying reports of the results made to prove its efficiency.

Prof. Scott does not assert that there have been much good advertising without formal application of psychological knowledge on the part of the advertiser. Good common sense is a valuable asset for a professional advertisement-maker to possess, and when he adds to a good familiarity with type faces and display a knowledge of the human mind that will enable him to appeal more intimately and surely to its susceptibility to suggestion, almost by rule, Prof. Scott's argument will undoubtedly be found to sustain the proposition that even the best advertisers will be benefited by a knowledge that psychology may be studied with profit to their new efforts. The author does not confuse the reader with technical terms, but in telling how to attract attention and hold it, to direct the tendency of the fickle mind to remember the things that have attracted its attention, to be affected by suggestion, command, and persuasion, illustrates his theory by examples of good and bad advertising, and by representations of desirable and instructive or injurious association that make clear the meaning of the text. An examination of almost any page in a newspaper or magazine will show to the reader of this book that some application of the theory he presents has been made to advertising, but that many more advertisers go on spending money in entire ignorance of the hard that science extends to them.

In seeking to attract attention—the first object of the advertiser—it must be borne in mind that the human mind is so constituted that it can only perceive a few things at a time—four words in a line, for instance. Illustrations may help to attract attention, and if there is striking display to hold that attention the reader may go on to study explanatory text. But the illustration should be self-explanatory and the text relevant to something. An advertisement that is intended to advertise pianos and only describes excellent qualities that could be truthfully attributed to bicycles is irrelevant. By judicious repetition of relevant advertising the eye of the reader is attracted, and the frequent impression made on the eye creates a habit of the mind that leads its possessor to pick, when he wishes to buy, to the institution established in it by repeated contact with the advertisement. Advertising of the irrelevant sort, which makes temporary or no lasting impression on the mind, may be found whenever one takes up a magazine or newspaper. To be effective, therefore, advertising must be skillfully conceived. The advertiser who forgets that the reader may not know that he is famous, lacks the psychological knowledge that he should possess and learn the opportunity that comes with effective attention of a plain fact. First of all, secure attention, then fix it by repetition, and do not let the reader and possible buyer get away by failing to hold him by interesting, informative, and progressive information.

Although the mind is sometimes considered fickle, it is so constituted that it likes to be commanded. It has been so persistently commanded to by a certain brand of soap that when it wants a cake of soap it is very likely to remember that command and ask for it. But command must be accompanied by persuasion, and it must be supported by the quality of excellence in the goods to be commercially considered. The "return coupon" with which everybody is acquainted, served a double purpose. It brought prompt answers from persons who were glad to be presented with a convenient way of answering a letter that called for co-operation on the part of the person addressed and gave him a chance to do something. It also gave the advertiser an opportunity to learn how valuable a publication might be as an advertising medium. The invention has proved valuable as a means of hurrying people to answer while it was vividly in their memory. A. E. W.

THE HAPSBURGS.

Emperor Francis Joseph, His Family, and His Environment.*

DOWN into purple and stamped on the back with the double eagle of Austria, this book celebrated the virtues of the dean of European Emperors and the pride of the House of Hapsburg, especially the pride of that formidable Archduchess Sophie, the mother of his royal and imperial Francis Joseph. The spirit of the author is one approaching idolatry of the most perfect survival of the feudal age, and the story purports to be that of the inside of matters in the history of the 19th century, which involve the fortunes and vagaries of the rulers of Austro-Hungary. Much gossip there is and some free speaking about various imperial and royal personages, but only praise and apology for two of them, the Emperor and his latest consort, Empress Elizabeth, already celebrated at length in the previous book by the same author. Here translated from the Wiener Sultung is the announcement of the birth of the future Emperor, which took place on Aug. 18, 1830:

Her Imperial Highness Archduchess Sophie, wife of his Imperial Highness Archduke Franz Karl, and daughter-in-law of the Emperor Majesty Francis I., has been happily delivered of a son at the Imperial Palace of Schönbrunn. Her Imperial Highness and the Imperial Duke are both in a satisfactory condition. The christening will take place to-morrow at the Imperial Palace of Schönbrunn, and will be followed by a Cassle.

Much is told of the life and education and childish sayings of the youngster thus so formally introduced to the world, more of the high and mighty ways of his ambitious and ordinary mother. One of the boy's friends was a country priest, of whom the following is an anecdote: Herr Pfarrer Deppelhauer had just been told by "Franz" that his mother begged him to come to dinner.

"Atch-chew," sneezed the priest. "Atch-chew," and after blowing his nose vigorously on a gorgeous red and yellow handkerchief, he shouted roundly:

"No, my boy, I won't come. I've got two fine sausages and some right Bohemian (tasty) sauerkraut for my supper, and that's much better than the manner of your grand lady. Tell her I'm not coming with you, all. You can tell your mother that I'll come in for dessert. Your coffee is pretty fair, but for the rest—atch."

Later, after what must have been a very happy boyhood in spite of the fussiness of the mother, comes the account of the process of giving the young Prince his military training, making of him in the French phrase, "de la chair à canon"—food for powder.

He was made to groom his own horse, to saddle and bridle and feed it, to serve and manoeuvre a cannon. He was put through the ordinary infantry drill, was taught to lay mines under the direction of a Colonel of sappers, to handle a pick and shovel shoulder-to-shoulder with the gray-uniformed men of the pioneer corps, and from 5 in the morning till late at night the lad labored almost unceasingly, dropping rifle or sword only to sit before a desk where the practical and classical education was pursued most industriously.

Then comes the glowing epic telling of the "baptism of fire." The resources of three languages are exhausted in describing the manner in which the heroic soldier behaved in the face of the enemy at Santa Lucia, the victory won by the Austrian Field Marshal Radetzky over the Italians in 1848. Then the enthusiastic author quotes a poem about it in the original German.

Following upon this martial episode the story turns to the means by which the Archduchess Sophie literally pushed the Emperor Ferdinand off the dual throne in order to make room for her son. It is made plain that Ferdinand was not a Prince of heroic mold, but it also appears, in spite of the disposition of the story teller, that his immediate Franz Joseph consented to a very shabby treatment of his uncle and overseer—all the actual dirty work being done by the Archduchess, grimly figured as Fate. It is to be recalled, too, that all this time Francis Joseph's father, the Archduke Franz Karl, was alive, and that he also was pushed aside for his son. However, he seems to have been an amiable old gentleman, quite content to get out of the way and leave things imperial to his wife. Naturally much of the book is taken up with the dainty and character of this very managing lady. The author has given mentions enough of her hardness and pride and ambition and lack of sympathy, though she declines to call the terrible old lady "unsympathetic" in any ordinary sense. Here, it appears, was an imperial conscience not amenable to ordinary rules. She was devoted to her son—but her son must do exactly as she wished while everybody else must stand aside and "after you" or be pushed relentlessly off the earth. After the marriage of Francis Joseph with the Princess Elizabeth of Bavaria, the ultimate outcomes in spite of the disapproval of the Archduchess, to have this passage:

There may be no accurate accounts given in old, but there are accurate accounts concerning with a mother-in-law determined to do her worst, and perfectly convinced that she is in the Right, and this is why Francis Joseph never interfered when his young wife, unable to put up any longer with his mother's domination, would go away for a time upon lonely journeys, or on long sojourns abroad which made everybody feel that she never sought for her husband and his home and still less for her duties.

One is regaled with verbatim reports of many outside lectures delivered to the Emperor by his mother, several of the most pointed being for just the shortcomings of the Emperor, and after one such follows this from the author:

Never had the enthusiastic Archduchess loved him more passionately than at that moment, when she felt in his whole attitude the revenance of many of the tender ties which had bound him so strongly to her, but she was pitiless. The Emperor, in her opinion, quite unchangeable in her opinions, and as ever, absolutely unrelenting in her tyrannical conditionness.

It may be noted that in these conversations which are accredited to the imperial mother and son, the pen's remarks are frequently of such a feminine flavor that nobody in his senses can doubt one thing. Whatever their original form and wherever the faithfulness to the substance of the original, they have suffered strange sex changes of wording in passing through the minds and lips of feminine retailers of Court gossip. It would seem, by the way, that American royalties are never so alone as not to have somebody in earshot, for some of the conversations are of the sort that would suppose impossible except in a hermetically sealed privacy of two.

One cannot begin, of course, to retail a mill or a tenth of the interesting Court gossip which may be found within these covers of purple and gold, but here is a few words in the picture of the Empress, striving simply as a woman:

A woman, forsooth, perhaps he is a high and mighty Emperor and handsome sovereign. Her my Franz, is assailed on all sides by temptation. It is the women who are to blame, the wicked temptresses!—and she clinched her little pearly teeth fiercely, as the thought of all those Circes parading him with their wiles and allurements.

In another place is a rehabilitation of the maligned Katharina Schratt, familiarly called "Katti," actress in the Burg Theatre at Vienna and dear friend of the Emperor and the Empress alike—not at all the kind of a woman the wicked world has thought her. It is related, too, that the Empress Elizabeth wanted to come to America. "That," says she, "is the only republican country I ever admired. A race which produced Abraham Lincoln and Washington cannot produce tyrannical and despotic." And again there is the story of a young American who at a Swiss hotel accosted the Archduke Rainer, the Emperor's cousin, of whose identity the young man, naturally enough, was quite ignorant. "I'm going to do Europe thoroughly," says this young man.

From this place I'm going over to Austria; they say the Tyrol is fine. Well, we'll see. I'm curious to meet the big-wigs in Vienna; are they as stiff as the aristocracy of our Republic there, and he told me that the aristocracy and the imperial family are extremely gay.

Archduke Rainer behaved very much like a gentleman, it is related, and when the young man found out who the stranger was from one of the horrified members of the suite, he rushed after the royal personage to apologize. The two came back to the hotel in a fashion not unlike that in which Thackeray said he would not mind walking up Pall Mall. Thackeray spoke, to be sure, of "a couple of Dukes." The young American had the felicity of walking up hill arm in arm with a real live Archduke. Glory enough for his children's children, one would think! While we are upon these matters, listen, if you please, to the name which was given in baptism to the lady known as the Archduchess Marie Therese:

Toward the end of the book are dark hints about the so-called mysterious Family Statutes of the House of Hapsburg. The author says such statutes exist, but "cannot be disclosed," and she puts these last words in italics. However, she assures us that it was in conformity with the secret laws of the royal and imperial house that within recent years the Emperor relieved to the status of plain commoners the two Archduke John and Leopold Salvator, who from their imperial birthrights descended to be simple John Orth and Leopold Wölfling. It is hardly necessary to say that the book is unboundedly enthusiastic of the wisdom, goodness, justice and truth, on the Sphinx Chrysolite, has it, of Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary, though it seems also to show that as long as his mother the Archduchess Sophie was alive the Emperor was not the ruler of his patriotic States in any real sense save as her representative. Yet it was made evident enough that his people of no many and divers races love Francis Joseph, and reasons enough are furnished why they should be so. For one thing the venerable head of the dual monarchy has learned the differing tongues of his Magyars, Austrians, Bohemians, Croats, Italians, Poles, Czechs, and what not, and talks to the men of each race in their own mother language. The book has hundreds of incidents to relate of the Emperor's kindness and the personal efforts he has made for his people in times of distress, for instance, of the floods along the Danube.

About Naval Officers.

THE SPIRIT OF THE SERVICE. By Rear Admiral Silas Wood. Illustrated by Reisz F. Thebaud. Boston: Cloth, Pp. 184. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

The spirit which animates these officers whose object in life is to assist in the upbuilding of the navy of the United States is the spirit referred to in the title of this book, which tells of the enthusiasm force lost by this motive to a Captain of years and experience, who by his conscientiousness and devotion to duty became the cause of a political "boss" and for a time to admiral-retired and consequently made subordinate by the heads of the Bureau of Navigation. He is detached from the enthusiasm of the navy yard to Brooklyn, where commanded of a vessel only to lose it again, and finally to be sent home for the short-comings of the Empress, and after one such follows this from the author:

Never had the enthusiastic Archduchess loved him more passionately than at that moment, when she felt in his whole attitude the revenance of many of the tender ties which had bound him so strongly to her, but she was pitiless. Cruising Among the West Indies.

SHIPMATES IN SUNSHINE. By F. Frankfort Moore. Illus. New York: D. Appleton & Co.

"Shipmates in Sunshine," by that very genial gentleman who wrote the story of Oliver Goldsmith in "The Jessamy Bride," the romance of Sheridan in "A Maid of Limerick," and a highly romantic novel in "Castle Omorah," is neither biographical nor historical. Represented as a kindly gentleman bent on securing copy, the author takes a trip to the West Indies on board the steamer Avon, sailing from England. And since it is copy he is looking for, the amiable gentleman should be well satisfied, for he follows up to the end few separate and distinct romances—all of which endings are eminently satisfactory to all parties concerned. There was Miss Ormsby, a young lady from the Midlands who had very companionable eyes. Her father, a retired merchant, was taking the young lady on the trip in order to escape the fascinations of a young London barrister to whom she had surrendered her heart on a visit to her aunt. It was a matter of no importance that Mr. Ormsby had decided against the young attorney before he even heard his name, and that—well, sometimes if things are cleverly managed a young lady can have her own way without her father supporting in the least that he is not having him.

Miss Ethel Hope, a young person well chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. Kenn, escorted by one Mr. Sowerby, nevertheless breaks her bounds, in spite of everything, and has her way, which is also the way of one Captain Wingfield, recently wounded in South Africa. And then there was Miss Crotton. Her mention was of much older standing than either of the other two. It dated far back, some ten years before the voyage, when a highly honorable young man broke his engagement to her because he lost a fortune and did not want to live on hers. In order to escape the temptings of love and the devil, he disappeared, and Miss Crotton, with a strand of gray hair over the temple that was not there at their parting, suddenly runs across him at Martinique—of all places. And even then he is obdurate, which makes one, even while respecting him as a most honorable gentleman, lose patience with him as a lover. Goodness knows what might have happened if one Aytoun, a worthy Scot, had not accidentally discovered him and restored the fortune to him, which after all has never rather blessed to entire service during the war with Spain.

Two young girls, Sue Ballinger and Barbara Thornhill, who are guests of Capt. Cortwright at the time when most of his trials are encountered, are interesting studies introduced perhaps in order that the love interest may not be lacking. They, growing from commonness and opinions on men and his methods are well worth reading. Each shows, as the story proceeds, how the spirit of service has become a reality to her. She goes to Cuba as a nurse during the war, and there again meets and becomes engaged to Gaut, Manfactors, who knows her as a clever and high-spirited girl, by entering a convent.

A Young Clergyman.

"Holy of Holyhood" has a harmful sound, but this particular Holy is an earnest and observant young clergyman, much "run after" by the women, especially the young women of his congregation. He keeps a strikingly "level head," just a little unbalanced upon one occasion by the parting admonition of a departed "General"; and so even as we are introduced to the one young lady of his flock who long refuses to meet him, and persistently turns toward him her throwy side, we are sure of the sequel. The matters who i. e., Miss Cecilia Compton, who simply nowhere handle the scoffing girl, who, nearly destroyed them, said "o'ers" with hardly perceptible sarcasm!

Since a "mesh" is defined as "one of the spaces between the threads of a net," we are a little at a loss to know how "the transparent meshes" of "Mrs. Barle's" gown could possess "a certain classic distinction" lent by her superb figure"; but we are very glad that the author achieves "classic distinction" only, and not the satirizing of the young clergyman.

The little romance is pleasantly told, and is the vehicle of some thoughtful study of the old and ever new problem of rich and poor, and of the duty of the Church to both. Naturally, it solves no problems, but it is helpful and suggestive, and always on the right side.

Fleming Revell Books.

The Fleming H. Revell Company's announcements this season include several books that deal, in some manner, with the religious education of the child. They are "The Natural Way," by Patterson Du Bois; "The Pedagogical Bible School" by B. B. Haslett; "The Teacher and the Child," by H. Tabistion Mark; "The Child for Christ," by A. H. McKinney, and Dr. Schauffler's "Pastoral Leadership in Sunday School Forces."

The Becketts of "Punch"

Memories of Father and Sons. By Arthur W. à Beckett. Frontispiece. 8vo, $4.00 net. (Postage 16 cts.)

The story told by Mr. à Beckett, who for twenty-eight years was on the staff of "Punch," is a most interesting one. It is full of anecdotes of Douglas Jerrold, Thackeray, John Leech, Henry Mayhew, and others. The author's career has also brought him in contact with many other eminent men of the past forty years.

The Roadmender

Over a year ago the publisher issued "The Roadmender" in a modest little volume. The author was then unknown, and the book was brought out without any preliminary flourish. Since then it has gradually reached the great public, it has become known as a book that "is for companionship, not a passing acquaintance."—(New York Times.)

The Creevey Papers

A selection from the Diaries and Correspondence of Thomas Creevey (1768-1838.) Sometime M. P. for Thetford, and afterward for Appleby; Secretary to the Board of Control, etc., dealing with all the principal events and characters social and political from the close of the 18th Century to 1838. From family papers hitherto unpublished. Edited by the Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., M. P., Author of "The Life of the Duke of Wellington," etc. With Portraits. Two vols. 8vo. $8.00 net. (Ex. 25 cts.)

This book may be regarded as a companion to the Greville Memoirs and the Croker Papers. It will probably prove to be not inferior in interest to either of these works, and dealing with the same period as Croker has added but little to the opposite side in politics.

Isabella d'Este

A Study of the Renaissance.

By Julia Cartwright. 2 vols. Illustrated, $7.50 net. (Express 25 cts.)

The subject of this memoir was a prominent figure in Italy when culture and the pursuit of the arts were at their height. It offers a picture of court life hardly to be found elsewhere.

The High History of the Holy Graal

Translated from the old French by Sebastian Evans, LL.D. With decorations and drawings by Jessie M. King. 8vo, $2.50 net. (Postage 22 cts.) Edition-de-luxe, vellum, $15 net.

The translation is taken from the most complete known copy of the "Book of the Graal." It is extensive, so that the publishers believe that in this volume they are offering to readers the original story of the Powers of the Holy Graal, whole and fragment, as it left the author's hands.

HERBERT SPENCER.

In the world of letters, as distinguished—the distinction is not very definite—from the world of science, Herbert Spencer has outlived to gratitude not usually recognized. He influenced George Eliot and he inspired Hippolyte Taine. The former, as a creative artist, the latter as critic and historian, were strongly influenced by the stimulating and enticing philosophy which started all things from "indefinite, incoherent homogeneity" and traced their complex development by the interplay of inherent qualities and environment. It is true that the practically impenetrable intricacy of both these interplaying sets of forces left the vivid imagination of the novelist and of the critic a scope in which each delighted without really reaching solutions of the problems they took up, but it may be assumed that the philosopher gave them their initial impulse and set them the goal which they pursued, fascinated, to the end.

And it is a fair inference that it was substantially this influence on active minds that gave to Mr. Spencer the extraordinary vogue he had—greater, certainly, than that of any thinker after his kind in the latter half of the nineteenth century. His philosophy had a double attraction. It was destructive, and on its destructive side was pressed with such zest of militancy, with relentlessness, with a piquant touch of contemptuousness toward opponents, qualities which we all enjoy when exhibited on our side. It was also, in form and in purpose, constructive. It offered an explanation intelligible to a vast multitude of minds, if not conclusive to others, of the tremendous problems that beset the souls of all in whom "whence and whither" stir lifelong curiosity. On the one hand, Mr. Spencer challenged what seemed to many the arbitrary demand of the orthodox in religion and philosophy that man shall accept for the mystery of human life and the world in which it passes solutions they cannot understand, on authority they cannot verify. On the other hand, he presented his own solution, which at least appeared comprehensible, and supported it with a great mass of evidence which probably few of his followers fully examined, but which was of such nature that they could examine it, and at any rate was not supernatural. Obviously, quite apart from the soundness of his philosophy, here were the elements of an immense vogue. Taking into account the noble sincerity of the man, his untiring intellectual energy, his rare mastery of the art of orderly exposition, his gift of personal appeal to those he addressed, and the extreme simplicity of his style, especially in the statement of generalization, and remembering that these qualities were in active use for some forty years, and it is not surprising that he gained an influence so wide and strong.

One force also he exerted of great moment: so to which he was at one with the best and the most endearing feature of religion—not only of the Christian religion, which alone most English-speaking men think of in connection with that term, but of nearly all the religions that have shaped human conduct within historic times. He taught unceasingly, with fervor and with ingenuity, as a truth of science, as the generalization of greatest value from facts of the widest scope, the doctrine of the Golden Rule. Of the words to which he has given a place in the vocabulary of philosophic science—and they are not few—the one that has passed farthest beyond that domain and is efficient on the lips and in the hearts of men is "altruism." The idea it embodies is, as we have intimated, older than the Sermon on the Mount and nowhere quite absent from human relations. He gave to it a kind of authority it did not before possess. He established it in a realm from which practically it had been excluded. He crowned it as the supreme truth, which the broadest investigation sustained and the acutest skepticism could not undermine. He showed it to be the conclusion of the ripest intelligence, the very test of sound sense as well as the suggestion of the purest spiritual aspiration. Much of his doctrinal philosophy is already disputed. The naturalists and the metaphysicians are ruthlessly gnawing at his demonstrations. This achievement will stand, and on the roll of benefactors of the race it entitles him to an honorable place.

MR., OR MISS, OR MRS.?

Presumably when a woman writer disguises both her identity and her sex by using either a masculine pseudonym or one that may denote either gender, she is flattered when reviewers call her "Mr." She must desire her writing to be taken for a man's work. We have known a thoroughly competent reviewer to call Miss Violet Paget "Mr. Vernon Lee" or "Mr. Lee" a dozen times in the course of a review of moderate length. The author of "Pigs in Clover," who signs her work Frank Danby, and writes with masculine vigor, is frequently taken for a man. In the case of Violet Paget and Julia Frankau, however, the error is now uncommon; most professional readers of manuscripts and proofs are aware of the identity of the women behind the pseudonyms.

In the case of other writers, however, even the publishers seem to be in doubt of their sex. The publishers of Anna Macdonnell's "Life of St. Francis," for instance, speak of the author as "Mr. Macdonnell"; the publishers of the new translation of Cellini's autobiography call the writer of the introduction "Miss Macdonnell." "Who's Who" ignores the existence of both this pacific writer and S. G. Tallentyre, author of "Women of the Salons," and a new "Life of Voltaire." It is a matter of fact that this last-named writer is also a woman, but, speaking broadly, nobody knows her real name. In the London Literary Year Book the address of "S. G. Tallentyre" is given as "care of Macmillan & Co." The representatives of the Macmillan Company here know nothing of the lady. Reviewers generally write "Mr. Tallentyre," but it would be equally wrong to call her either "Miss" or "Mrs." Tallentyre. Her identity is carefully concealed, and the reviewers may call her whatever they please.

MAGAZINE NOTES.

In the article on "Parsifal" in the December Critic, A. I. Du Pont Coleman seems to side with those persons who object to the performance of the Bühnenweihfestspiel out of Bairuth. His point of view, however, is aesthetic, or sentimental, and not commercial. The article is beautifully illustrated with reproductions of the Fantin-Latour lithographs. Other striking features in this number of the Putnams' entertaining magazine of art and literature are the reproductions of engravings of famous portraits by Wattu and an article on "Fantin-Latour and Egmontan" by Frank Weitenkampf.

The Craftsman for December contains an article on "The Stewardship's Art: the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Centuries," by Jean Schopfer, translated by Irene Sargent. It is well illustrated. Caryl Coleman writes of "The Sacred Cipher," Harvey Mills of "Sermons in Sun-dried Bricks," and the usual departments are as interesting as ever.

Country Life in America has a colored pictorial supplementary sheet, "The Farmer's Christmas," by H. Bertram Crawford, and an article on "Christmas Greens and Flowers" by Thomas McAdam, also illustrated in color. In all other respects this number is noteworthy. The pictures of the country in the Winter are beautiful. Among the writers are Stewart Edward White, Charles G. D. Roberts, and J. Horace McFarland.

Mr. W. D. Howells, whose new novel, "The Son of Royal Langbrith," begins as a serial in the January number of The North American Review, has an uncommonly interesting article in the December number on "The Personality of Hawthorne," which serves as a review of Mr. Julian Hawthorne's recent book about his father, but is something more than that.

The December number of Bibis contains an article on the "New Sphinxes of Jesse Pound in Egypt" and an abstract of lectures by Dr. Arthur J. Evans of the Ashmolean Museum, on "Pre-Phoenician Writing in Crete, and the Bearing on the History of the Alphabet."

The December number of Outdoors, formerly The Golfer, contains articles on "Georgian Court," George Gould's Lakewood home; "The Development of American Country Life," "Pigeon Raising" and "Ice Yachting" and three articles on golf. The many illustrations are excellent.

Shakespeareana Sale.

At least four of the twelve items in the sale of Shakespeare relics, held in London on Monday of this week by Messrs. Sotheby, sold very well. The highest-priced lot in the sale was a copy of the Fourth Folio edition of Shakespeare's plays, 1685, with the rare imprint: "Printed for Henry Herringman and are to be sold by Joseph Knight and Francis Saunders." This brought the record price of £215, the former record being £142, given in December of last year for the Mackenzie copy. The measurement was 14½ by 9¼ inches; the condition was said to be unusually fine. There is a copy of this imprint in the Lenox Branch of the New York Public Library.

The much-advertised "unknown portrait" of Shakespeare, painted on a panel of oak measuring 28 by 16 inches, and said to have been taken when he lay on his deathbed, brought £181. The Sotheby cataloguer said: "There is, in every evidence, short of positive proof, that it is a veritable portrait of Shakespeare, taken from 'the life,' for the contention of its believers is that it would be impossible for the portrait, bearing as it does upon the features visible signs of illness, to have been painted from memory." Were this "positive proof" to be had, however, the sum of £181 would have been largely exceeded at the Sotheby sale. The portrait was reproduced and described in Whitord's "Antiquarian" for October, 1895. Another reproduction was given in the Sotheby sale catalogue.

A casket made from the wood of the mulberry tree "planted by Shakespeare" sold for £120. It measured 9 inches in length, 5 inches in width, and 2 inches in depth, and was fitted as an inkstand. For a silver seal top specimen of the period of James I., on the bowl of which was engraved a full-length figure of Shakespeare, £75 was given. Beneath the figure was the date of Shakespeare's death, 1616, and on the seal were the initials of Shakespeare and of Anne Hathaway. The cataloguer said: "This was, no doubt, a memorial spoon made in 1616, either for a relative of the dramatist or one of his friends."

Messrs. Sotheby's sale of Dec. 11-12 includes an unusual number of interesting literary autographs. There are three letters of Tennyson, one of them written to Gustave Doré in reference to the latter's illustrations for "Idylls of the King." Lot No. 857 is a portion of "The Princess," eight lines of the original manuscript, given by the poet to Mrs. Brookfield, beginning:

Fair daughter, when we sent the Prince your way,

Several Thackeray letters are included in the sale. Two of the number are addressed to Fraser in relation to contributions to Fraser's Magazine. One letter, dated July 1, 1839, refers to the articles which were reprinted under the title of "The Paris Sketch Book." A copy of the first edition of "Pendennis," presented to John Elliotson, has inserted a friendly letter of the novelist.

There is a large original portrait of Thackeray in crayons, 16½ by 12½ inches, from the Fitzgerald and Chalmer Smith collections. Not No. 1,105 is the original pen-and-ink drawing of Thackeray's "The Handsome," depicting an executioner of the sixteenth century holding up the severed head of a woman by the hair. This is a characteristic example of Thackeray's artistic work, most probably intended to represent the execution of Mary Queen of Scots. There are nine other original drawings of Thackeray's in addition to an original study in crayons of an urn and humorous heads, with Thackeray's portrait below, dated March, 1858.

New Thumbnail Books.

New issues in the Thumbnail Series, tiny, well printed books in stamped leather covers, (the Century Company, $1 per volume,) are Fitzgerald's "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam," the text of the fourth, first, and second editions, with explanatory notes, and, by way of introduction, John Hay's address at a dinner of the London Omar Club; Goldsmith's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," and "Scarron," (the Apology, Critic, and part of the Pseudo,) from Jowett's translation of Plato. The text of these charming little books may be read open, while type, paper, and binding are always excellent.

Plutarch.

"Plutarch's Lives of Caesar, Brutus, and Antony," (in Sir Thomas North's translation, or "Shakespeare's Plutarch," as Prof. Skeat calls it,) are published in one of the little volumes of Macmillan's Classics, (75 cents,) for the use of students of Shakespeare's Roman plays. The little book will be welcomed by others. The notes are satisfactory, and there is an explanatory introduction. Martin Brier of the Polytechnic High School, Oakland, Cal., is the editor.

BACHELOR MAIDS.

BACHELOR maids have been in fashion so long that they ought to be getting old-fashioned. We all know all about them—how they defy conventions, live in hansom cabs, and make short pieces go a long way. We have heard, too, that they drink cocktails, use slang, smoke cigarettes, and sit in barber's chairs to have their shoes polished. But such slanders do never old believe. A new book about bachelor maids and the way they talk (which is presumably just the way other maids of the twentieth century talk) is not attractive merely because of its subject. We are willing to admit that we took up "Merry Hearts: The Adventures of Two Bachelor Maids," with some misgivings. The title does not allure. But the book deserves another title. Anne Story Allen wrote it, and it is published by Henry Holt & Co. Best it is said, for in the mighty flood of unmentionable books there's nothing brighter or better in its cheerful, dainty, trifling way.

Not a long while, when some of us were young, Blanche Willis Howard's "One Summer" was passed about from hand to hand, and talked about, until the topic grew stale, and other books took its place, but never one exactly like it, though nothing could be simpler in form and substance. "Merry Hearts" (one wishes it could have a more distinctive name) belongs to the category of "One Summer." It is a little simple story of young love and good-fellowship, with a touch of genuine and appreciable pathos here and there, with no reaching for effect, with no hint of "psychology," with no waste of words, true enough to life as far as it goes, and going as far as some of its readers can sympathize, but without a touch of the lime of the world.

The scene is New York and the time the present, as the playbills say, and "local color" is applied daringly enough, and successfully enough; though we should never think of calling this a typical picture of New York life.

Nothing of this brief story of the life of two girls, one who writes and one who paints pictures and their pot-boiling, during an unspecified period of time, can be fairly told in noticing the book. Each chapter is a little story in itself, and the narrative is not continuous. The incident of the manicure's might be made the groundwork of a successful comedy. The chapter about reading the novels of "The Duchess" on a rainy day involves an example of sensible criticism which ought to put a conventional reviewer to the blush. The episodes of the widow's courtship and of the capitulation of the professor to the talkative girl he had so persistently avoided are good enough to be true. The account of the purchase of wedding gifts at the Japanese shop shows to what good use a perfectly sincere artist can put well-worn material.

As for the two girls themselves—the principal girls—one realizes, as the narrative closes with the wedding of one and the betrothal of the other, that they are just natural and attractive girls, not geniuses of genius and wit, or even of dazzling beauty, though that is always, thank God, enough in fiction. They are nice girls whom the coarsest cynic would never dare to accuse of smoking cigarettes or getting their boots blacked in public places.

Prescott.

"Selections from the Works of William H. Prescott," (Boston: H. M. Caldwell & Co., $1,) is the title of a little book with purple leather covers, stamped with gold, containing a sketch of Prescott by the editor, A. D. Hall, and characteristic passages from "Ferdinand and Isabella," "The Conquest of Mexico," and "The Conquest of Peru." A vignette of the historian serves as frontispiece.

"The Comedie of Errors."

In what is called the First Folio Edition of Shakespeare, edited by Charlotte Porter and Helen A. Clarke, (T. Y. Crowell & Co., 50 cents per volume,) a new volume is "The Comedie of Errors," with the First Folio text in modern typography, and an introduction, glossary, list of various readings, and budget of "selected criticisms." This edition, in three volumes, is admirably printed.

Story by Marie Corelli.

"Angel's Wickedness," a story by Marie Corelli, is published in a pretty little book, for the holidays, by Walter S. Hearn, (25 cents.) Angel's story is sad, and Miss Corelli says it is true. Angel is a creature of the London streets, who is afflicted with poverty and tortured by moral inferiority, who proves herself a heroine and sacrifices her life for the sake of others. The story is told in Miss Corelli's approved flamboyant manner.

Classical Scholarship.

Dr. John Edwin Sandys writes in the preface to his "History of Classical Scholarship, from the Sixth Century B. C. to the End of the Middle Ages,"—published by the Macmillan Company in this country, that this volume is to be followed shortly by another, in which he will deal with the history of scholarship from Petrarch to the present day. The present book is divided into six sections: I., The Athenian Age, 600-300 B. C.; II., The Alexandrian Age, 300 B. C. to the Beginning of the Christian Era; III., The Roman Age of Latin Scholarship, 100 B. C. to 150 A. D.; IV., The Roman Age of Greek Scholarship, from the Beginning of the Christian Era to 529 A. D; V., The Byzantine Age, or the Middle Ages in the East, 529 to 1453 A. D., and VI., The Middle Age in the West, 529 to 1350 A. D. In the course of his introduction the author writes:

> A knowledge of the general course of the history of classical scholarship in the past is essential to a complete understanding of its position in the present, and its prospects for the future. Such a knowledge is in the main, to the student, and even to the scholar, who desires to make an intelligent use of the leading modern commentaries on classical authors, which necessarily refer to the history of scholarship in the past, is of great use. And the study of that history is not without its incidental points of interest in so far as it touches on themes of such variety and such importance as the earliest speculations on the origin of language, the growth of literary and dramatic criticism at Athens, the learned labor of the critics and grammarians of Alexandria and Rome, and of the Byzantine rhetors at Constantinople. It also has its points of contact with the scholastic philosophy of the Middle Ages, with the revival of learning and the reformation of religion, and with the foundations of the educational systems of the foremost nations of the modern world.

New Edition of "The Quiberon Touch."

The new edition of Cyrus Townsend Brady's novel, "The Quiberon Touch," published by D. Appleton & Co. in 1897, will appear late in the Winter under a new title, "Little France," remaining, however, the first name as an alternate title. The edition will also have a new preface, in which Mr. Brady gives his reasons for changing the title. In the course of this preface he says:

> What a profitable reward awaits him or her who will furnish names for special names, that in that are striking to their appeal to the public, they are sufficiently distinctive and yet not too far from the beaten path to have a public power of changing the standing and fame of the author. Some of the greatest of our novelists have thought it necessary to do just this thing, and I have thought it necessary to do it myself. I have thought that a name ought to do and the name ought not to do, in fact. To get such names is a part—and a very important part—of the art name of writing books. I thought I had made a case for "The Quiberon Touch." May, let me be honest, I still think so. This, despite the fact that the publishers, the advertising men, the booksellers, the critics, and the public say, by their silence, being a property mild and amiable author, I have taken advantage of the opportunity of a new edition to substitute for that name, which seems to me everything that a name ought to be, another title for this book, which may perhaps be received with greater favor. * * * Why should we not have a Hawks Touch? Or, to associate the great commander with his most tremendous exploit, a Quiberon Touch? Alas, it won't do! The public is not educated up to this touch yet. Perhaps, as I reckoned the story and call it "Little France."

Jesus and His Friends.

R. C. Gillie's new book, "The Kinsfolk and Friends of Jesus," published by the Macmillan Company, is a sequel to his "Story of Stories," but, he says in his preface, each may be read independently. He aim is to present complete sketches of the companions of Jesus in a fashion attractive to children. The reason for the present publication is set forth by Mr. Gillie in his preface:

> This book endeavors to give a clear outline and the color of life to the members of His apostolic circle in the confidence that as they emerge into distinctness the Master of them all will make a new impression of reality upon young readers. Secondly, the early part of the New Testament in which many intelligent children are interested is the Gospels. As a consequence of the transformation of the Apostles through our Lord's resurrection and the Pentecostal gift of the Spirit is unnoticed and the Epistles remain sealed books. This volume is intended to convince the child mind that the heroes of the Book of Acts were once the weak disciples of the Gospels, and to make the whole of the New Testament fascinating and intelligible by interweaving into the narratives the statements and hints of a personal character which are found in the Epistles.

The first part of the book deals with Jesus's kinsfolk—his mother, his brother James, and his kinsman, John the Baptist; then come his private friends—the sisters of Bethany, Lazarus, Mary Magdalen, Nicodemus, and his fellow-counsellor Cleopas and his comrade, and two others, and finally his Apostles—Andrew, Philip, Matthew, Thomas, James, John, Peter, Judas Iscariot—and with Paul. Of the sixteen illustrations in the book, seven are reproductions in the original colors of paintings by Botticelli, Francia, Mantegna, Giotto, Il Correggio, Dyce, and Raphael, while the other nine are reproductions in copies of pictures by Rubens, Dürer, Carlo Crivelli, Van Dyck, Raphael, and Andrea del Sarto. On the purple cover of the book is a reproduction in color of the painting of "Two Apostles" by the school of Giotto.

Concerning Banks of To-day.

Amos K. Fiske, whose book on "The Modern Bank" will be added in January to D. Appleton & Co.'s Business Series, is the chief editorial writer for The Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin. As he says in the preface to his book, he has some chapters on elementary principles and general methods and gives a rapid sketch of the development of banking and of existing systems. These are followed by such topics as trust companies, savings banks, private banking houses, foreign exchange, &c. For the historical part of the volume, he goes on, "free use has been made of the literature of the subject, with which the writer has long been familiar, and no particular authority is entitled to special acknowledgment," except Mr. Charles A. Conant's "History of Modern Banks of Issue." From the banks themselves he has derived information regarding the actual working of the American bank of to-day. His object is set forth in the first paragraph of the preface:

> The main purpose of this volume is not to set forth or discuss theories and principles or to give a history of banking or an account of different systems, but to describe in plain terms the various functions of the present-day bank in the United States and the methods by which its work is done. It is intended to give a clear idea of what is possible of what an up-to-date bank does and how it is done. For this it is necessary to take what may be regarded as a typical bank and deal with its mechanism and methods, as all others will be only variations upon it, and it would be confusing to attempt an explanation of differences in detail. A large German bank in Berlin, with a full variety of banking operations in the financial centre of the country, has been taken as the model, and what it does and the manner of doing it is taken as the type of the business and methods of banks in general.

There are to be a number of illustrations in the book.

Fine Sale at Anderson's.

At least one record price was given at the fine sale of rare books held Friday afternoon and evening, Dec. 4, by the Anderson Auction Company, in West Twenty-ninth Street. The best price of the two standards was $425, given for a remarkable copy of Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," complete in the original parts, as first issued, with all the covers and advertisements. This was the genuine first issue. The purchaser was George D. Smith. The former record was $375 (ex. given at a Sotheby's sale in Hodgson's October, 1902, for a copy in similar condition. A few of the plates were foxed, however.

The other items of interest were as follows:

Whittier's "Legends of New England," 1831, first edition, original binding, uncut, with the label intact, (slightly stained in places,) $275. Bought on "order."

Reville's "Liberal Christianity."

The fourth volume in the Crown Theological Library, to appear early next year with the imprint of G. P. Putnam's Sons, will be "Liberal Christianity: Its Origin, Nature, and Mission," by Jean Réville of the University of Paris, translated into English by Victor Leuliette. The book deals with the genesis of "Liberal Protestantism," which, the author says, "is the modern expression of the principle of the reformation," "liberal Protestantism founded on religious experience," "liberal Protestantism founded on moral experience," "liberal Protestantism founding on social experience," "the ideal of liberal Protestantism and its mission in modern society." In the course of his preface, in which he speaks of his present attempt, the author says:

> I do not claim (in this book) to teach anything new to those who are already familiar with the discussions which have been raised among Protestants by the religious problem of the present time. Still less do I presume to have renewed liberal Protestantism. My sole aim has been to collect into a coordinate whole its essential principles and conceptions on the points which are of the greatest importance for the religious and moral life of present-day society. Above all I have tried throughout to show the reasons for which, and the rational evolution through which, liberal Protestantism has been left to its present conclusions. The best way to account for any historical phenomenon is to trace out its growth. I have not attempted to exhaust all the items of the liberal Protestant programme; I deemed it enough to give a general sketch, dwelling at greater length only on the more salient features.

He has chosen "Liberal Protestantism" as the French title of the volume because, "the conception of religion and Christianity which is here set forth arose within the pale of Protestantism, where alone it took shape in regularly organized religious communities." What he says about liberal "Protestantism" applies to every similar conception outside the Protestant Churches.

FROM READERS.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

MR. H. G. WELLS is in search of an American publisher, and understandably as has been his lot in dealing the general publisher of publishers and authors, he finds them, of course, very unsatisfactory, but he attributes perhaps from the majority of those who hold that opinion, in consideration way misapprehension to the system in vogue rather than to the mental and moral attitude of the publishing trade. "I am all for the dignity of letters," he says, "and the present system is just about as uncomfortable and undignified for authors as one could well conceive. And as I do not think it is my privilege, my publisher either just now I live in great hope that before very long we may see a new system coming into operation to replace it. My ideal of an author is a man or woman of an unconditional and believing out alone line of creative thought or writing and in its finest constitution a very transcendent. Such a person I hold will do best for the world when most relieved from the worry of commercial transactions and in an atmosphere of mental calmness. But our present system of selling it from bargain by each book and buyer on the regular system is not proportionate to the sale of the book makes the writer in spite of himself a commercial adventurer. For the earlier book he gets contemptible sums, and when at last he wins his way to a wide popularity he receives himself by doing nothing enormous royalties and checks on account. He or his agent goes from the publisher to another, scenting them up to the highest possible royalty. On publishers expected to retain an author permanently, and the market between authors and publishers becomes every year more and more an affair of uncertainties, exaggerating haggling, and fancy prices—like no other sort of dealing in the world except, perhaps, horse dealing. It is a thoroughly bad state of affairs; it does not encourage and dehumanizes our literature and poisons our intellectual atmosphere.

"And yet it is very hard indeed to organize any better arrangement. I suppose it is Utopian to suggest that the publisher should pay the author a fixed income for all he writes and take all the adventures of profit and loss upon himself, though that in many cases would be infinitely better for both parties. But the wary businessman would fail to see where the inducement to work came in! Why, however, should I not get something of this sort from an American publisher? Why should I not have an annual retainer fee, and in addition have a stipulated royalty to pay me b definite sum for every book I write? If it is objected that the author would, in this case, lose the publisher's view, so disposed to disregard publisher's interests, the objection might be met by giving the author a royalty of 10 per cent. for example) beyond a certain sale. The publisher would be free to sell the serial rights of the book, arrange popular or illustrated editions, &c., at his own sweet will. Under such an agreement one also the publisher would become the exploiter of his author's reputation, he would study his works and his mental tendencies and not as the intelligent intermediary between him and the public. (It is one of the minor annoyances of an author's lot to discover that the publisher of his books knows about as much of his mental peculiarities as a carefully engaged sub editor.) I get such a personal and permanent engagement and such an intelligent interest for my French and Italian translations," says Mr. Wells; "agreements of this sort are coming into popularity in England, and I do not see why they should not presently arise amidst the wreckage of wild-cat booming in America. I at least am tired of being shied out upon the market first by one American firm and then another; it is a method for which I find my work intercontinentally unsuited, and until I can find a publisher with whom I can have direct and permanent relations I shall simply copyright my books and wait for better days."

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Your correspondent "G. E. H." has written admirably of Mrs. Trask's wonderful book, "Free, Not Bound," in non-sentimentally a living book, a book with a soul, and, like all soulful things, it reveals a rare beauty. A deeper meaning, the more intimately it is known. We have become so accustomed to the disbelief in illustration, to unreliable argument, to crude colors, clearly laid on, that the Doric simplicity and proportion of Mrs. Trask's story are unspeakably refreshing to the mind. Amid the mass of present-day fiction, this book of perfect English, of vital characters, of philosophy broad and deep, shines out like a Greek temple among the inchoate architecture of a modern city. Every thought is clearly chiseled, every word "the inevitable word," the dream beside the reader is largely, indeed to be him so until the last page is finished; and the very difficult motif—the evolution of a great soul of a love—is operated with such triumphant ease that we do not at once grasp the marvel of the achievement. Had Mrs. Trask never written anything save the chapter entitled "Credo," she would have proved her right to a high place upon the roll of literary artists and profound thinkers.

But while we are in accord with "G. E. H." in his appreciation of this rare novel, we must needs take issue with him on the subject of the Shaw or Shakespeare—the author of her name, merely, "the greatest dramatic of the dramatic." The question refers to the old, old question of "the Baconian lie." We freely concede that not more in a million chances, perhaps, is a Shakespeare the mouthpiece of truth to be visited, yet there come times when Shakespeare is right in Shakespeare. What or who, during Shakespeare's "Hamlet" I myself? "The man—such a man—of all the men of Bacon's Shakespeare," was had never had in his life a thought of which Hamlet might utter, "O how quickly may that calculated be represented as deep as Paradise!" Yet what and there are two opposed with Shakespeare? With a "Bacon" of such moral trait "to extort, rob, steal his God-given mental of others, or steal the printed wisdom that shadows the earth, the book, the law, upon which it revolves. God has given mankind "a Justifiable lie," whereby to protect him. Shakespeare had that to prevent an conspiracy with whom this to neither. Has such a mental and penitentiary of his choice proves the attitude truth of an true A character as man ever creator. The "logic of the situation," to use Hamlet's fable, is irresistible. "You All" and "We All."

I.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I wish to say again that the admirable Southerner "from you all" is admirable by the initiated or anyone any other question to the language than that of a composite plural, persons of the second and third persons, no matter what continuation marks may put upon it. Argument has never been my strong point.

My mention in the North during the past seven years has been to study microcosmically, for my own enlightenment, the speech, manners, and customs of some of the people of this locality. In order to carry out my plans I have met all classes, from the highest to the lowest, in all walks of life and under all circumstances. My interest, which I expect to say met with criticism, was written from the result of my careful studies of the subject.

Owing to the fact that my social status had to bearing on the question of "you all," I failed to mention it, and now hasten to say that another result of my observations here is that I have decided that I do not wish to be identified socially at all.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I have read in all of the Southeastern States and heard "you all" in conversational use by all classes, in continual use by some, frequently in the singular. "How is you girls doing to-day?" is not uncommon, and the possessive case points to the singular number.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I think "A Southerner" in your issue of Nov. 29 satisfactorily covers the ground in showing the relations in which the expression "you all" is employed.

Of course, if there be "many negroes who speak more elegant English each Sunday than Mr. Le Clerc ever did in his life," there need be no comparison with whom this to neither. Has such a mental and penitentiary of his choice proves the attitude truth of an true A character as man ever creator. The "logic of the situation," to use Hamlet's fable, is irresistible. "You All" and "We All."

I.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I wish to say again that the admirable Southern phrase "you all" is admitted by the initiated or anyone any other question to the language than that of a composite plural, persons of the second and third persons, no matter what continuation marks may put upon it. Argument has never been my strong point.

My mention in the North during the past seven years has been to study microcosmically, for my own enlightenment, the speech, manners, and customs of some of the people of this locality. In order to carry out my plans I have met all classes, from the highest to the lowest, in all walks of life and under all circumstances. My interest, which I expect to say met with criticism, was written from the result of my careful studies of the subject.

Owing to the fact that my social status had to bearing on the question of "you all," I failed to mention it, and now hasten to say that another result of my observations here is that I have decided that I do not wish to be identified socially at all.

II.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I have lived in all of the Southeastern States and heard "you all" in conversational use by all classes, in continual use by some, frequently in the singular. "How is you girls doing to-day?" is not uncommon, and the possessive case points to the singular number.

III.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

I think "A Southerner" in your issue of Nov. 29 satisfactorily covers the ground in showing the relations in which the expression "you all" is employed.

Of course, if there be "many negroes who speak more elegant English each Sunday than Mr. Le Clerc ever did in his life," there need be no comparison with whom this to neither. Has such a mental and penitentiary of his choice proves the attitude truth of an true A character as man ever creator. The "logic of the situation," to use Hamlet's fable, is irresistible. There needs not even the Searching angel's tear to that that Immanuel.

A Boer War Sonnet.

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

In a review attributed me in your issue of Dec. 6 of my "Boer War Lyrics," your critic, after quoting and over disturbing and vouching his critic generally—or, whatever she if was that approved him—in the protest, and after having in the same complimentary vein delivered himself as to the rest of the book, goes on to say that my final effusion on De Wet, (there are two of them) I quote, "is entirely beyond the comprehension," finally implying that the rest of the pieces are cast of the same cloth.

Permit me to submit, for your judgment, this sonnet, but of course, it runs as follows:

CHEVERAIN DE WET

Thou hast lost very sore at Bin,
Yet old Boer Bantam, we, too, from the head,
In the Great Land, Heavy vision of her lady
Hast lost very sore at Bin, Bin, Bin.
Bin, Bin, Bin.
Thy, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin.
Bin, Bin.
What some intimate chance in you not quite Bin, Bin, Bin.
Whether that the Indian in such war fare dark?
Bin, Bin, Bin.
What wailed such other notes in one or two?
Bin, Bin, Bin.
Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin, Bin.

BOSTON NOTES.

Miss Carman's "Sappho"; Mr. Goodspeed's Forthcoming Publications.

THE Bureau of Engravers has added Mr. Maynard's brief life of Paul Jones to the books supplied to the naval libraries, and Miss Edith Guerrier, the librarian at the Norwood Institute, has written the three original fairy book that Boston has seen for many a day, "Wanderfolk in Wonderland." It is illustrated by Miss Edith Brown, whom New York society will remember as the designer of the costumes worn by the bride and bridesmaids at one of the most beautiful weddings that New York has seen during the last ten years. The stories are charming absurdities, and, if the praise had not been applied to all manner of incongruous fun, it would be a pleasure to say that they recall "Alice in Wonderland."

The publishers of Miss Guerrier's book are Messrs. Small, Maynard & Co., who also issue "A Bunch of Roses," by Mrs. M. E. M. Davis, a book containing four plays, originally published in The Ladies' Home Journal, with two others, all perfectly adapted for presentation by amateurs. Four are very brief and the other two are not long.

A third book from the same firm is "The Theory of Advertising," by Walter Dill Scott, director of the psychological laboratory of Northwestern University.

Mr. Lorimer's "Letters from a Self-Made Merchant to His Son" has again come into prominence in the shape, the publication of Mr. Charles Monroe Merriman's parody, "Letters from a Son to His Self-Made Father," having awakened curiosity as to the original. The latter book naturally offends the generation pleased by Mr. Lorimer's, and the sons find that it puts their case crudely and rudely.

It was feared that Mr. Bliss Carman's "Sappho" would not be ready until January, but it will appear Saturday in a binding of white and pale green, foam and wave from one may chill them, remembering the Leucadian cliff. A Greek fret in green borders its title page and its end papers, and for the rest its paper and type are their own decoration.

In Mr. C. G. D. Roberts's introduction the story of the cliff of Leucas is dismissed as a myth, in spite of "the beauties which flowered out from its colored unreality," and of the several theories as to the disappearance of the poems the most plausible is said to be that which represents them as burned by St. Gregory Nazianzen in order that his own poems might be studied in their stead and the morals of the people thereby improved. "Of the efficacy of this act no means of judging has come down to us," adds Mr. Roberts. May such be the fate of every bard who strives to silence a rival! From a very hasty examination it seems that the most wonderful thing about the poems is that they are made to seem like translations. The occasional phrase that suggests the original is no more like a thing of the past than the imagined verse on the same page. One feels a Greek form beneath the English surface.

Mr. Charles E. Goodspeed, also fortunate, will be able to produce his beautiful volume, "The Poet Gray as a Naturalist," this month. The subject on which Mr. Charles Eliot Norton bases this book is Gray's own Linnaeus, and it is illustrated by reproductions of Gray's drawings and enriched with selections from his notes. The edition is limited to 500 copies, and as Ruskin, their former owner, approved the drawings and commended the Latin notes the appeal of four illustrious names is connected with it. "In the Dawn of the World," the volume of Burne-Jones pictures made for the "Bibla Innocentium" and meant to be printed at the Kelmscott Press, will not appear until next year. The drawings have been transferred to the wood and engraved by Mr. Cotterson Smith. The text is the first four chapters of Genesis, with the Vulgate and King James versions opposite pages.

These books are printed at the Merrymount Press, like nearly all of Mr. Goodspeed's publications, and Mr. D. B. Updike, manager of the Press, announces its removal from the outlands of Chestnut Street, to the furthest outpost of the new publishing district, Summer Street, beyond L. C. Page & Co., Dana Estes & Co., and H. M. Caldwell, and opposite the South Station. This will greatly add to the usefulness of the Press and facilitate the production of the Merrymount Austin, in the production of which Mr. Goodspeed, as publisher, is united with Mr. Updike as printer.

There is one incident which the humblest author has a right to expect will form part of his biography, the incident of the person found reading one of his books and astonished when told that the author stood before him, but according to Mr. Everett T. Tomlinson that dear delight is no longer a certainty. He lived through part of such an incident in the children's room at the public library the other day, and had no difficulty in extracting an opinion from the boy who had been reading one of his books, but at the point where he should, by all precedent, have expressed himself the youth looked up, saw the author, and—ran! Mr. Tomlinson's book is "Jack Ashley's Promise." So much for illustrated catalogues and children's papers.

Beatty's Study of Englishmen.

Elsie English's translation of Emile Boutmy's book on "The English People: A Study of Its Political Psychology," will not be published by G. P. Putnam's Sons until after the holidays. The book opens with the "Physical Environment" of the English people—that will, sensation and perception, creative imagination, and power of abstraction. In the course of his first chapter the author writes:

"It is evident that for the English people Nature has been a school of initiative activity, foresight, and self-control, and as always happens, these virtues have eventually become independent of the reasons for self-preservation and well-being which gave them rise. By a process easy of comprehension they have gradually acquired an individual value and character. To begin with, it was to the advantage of the community that the individual should practise them, and an instinctive mutual conspiracy was formed to render them indispensable, and to rank them high among the moral ideals of the race. * * It is often said that the English Nation is above all things utilitarian. This is true in the letter, although not in the spirit, if it means that the primary motive actuating the race are necessity and self-interest, all other motives being secondary; it is the case with every form of moral obligation; historically it originated in a question of utility.

"The author shows the influence of the climate of England on the sensibilities of the inhabitants and their capacity for experiencing sensations. Their sensibilities, he says, are not so acute and responsive as those of the Arab. "In these big, white-skinned bodies," he continues, "bathed in an atmosphere of perpetual moisture, sensations are experienced far more slowly; the 'circuits' of reflection taken longer to complete. Their impressions and perceptions are certainly less numerous and acute." In short, concludes M. Boutmy, "with the English it is necessary to strike hard, or repeatedly, in order to reach their perceptions; like a bell, the sound of which, deeper and more muffled than that of other bells, is the result of ampler and more prolonged vibrations."

Monotints.

G. P. Putnam's Sons publish this week the first volume on "Monotints," octavo, in the Connoisseur's Library, edited by Cyril Davenport of the British Museum. This is No. 15 and is by the editor. It will be followed by Volume XVI., on "Miniatures," by Dudley Heath; Volume IV., on "China and Porcelain," by Edward Dillon; Volume VII., on "English Furniture," by F. S. Robinson. Volume I. is on book-bindings, and others will deal with books with colored illustrations, bronzes, enamels, glass, ivories, jewelry, seals, and so forth, making in all twenty volumes. The authors will include C. E. Fourz, H. B. Wheatley, Martin Hardie, H. B. Walters, Frederick Wedmore, Nelson Dawson, A. Maskell, F. Roe, A. W. Pollard, J. A. Herbert, and others.

There are forty full-page plates in the present volume, including engravings of the painting of Mrs. Davenport by G. Romney, Houdthorpe's portrait of William, Prince of Orange; Spagnoletto's "The Large Executioner," Giorgione's "Benedict and Beatrice," engraved by Prince Rupert; Paul Van Somer's engraving of Huyeman's picture of the Coke family, Isaac Beckett's engraving of Kneller's portrait of Mme. Turner, the engraving by Thomas Frye of his drawing of Queen Charlotte, Chalon's picture of Queen Victoria, engraved by S. Cousins, and portraits of other people, scenes, and allegorical engravings of paintings by such artists as Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mercier, van Muyeum, Titian, and others.

The book deals with mezzotint engraving on metal: what it is and how it is done; mezzotint engravers of the seventeenth century—Ludwig von Siegen, Prince Rupert, the Van Somers, Luttrell, Isaac Beckett, John Smith, and others; eighteenth century engravers—the Fishers, F. Haldan, C. Turner, John Dean, Valentine Green, MacArdell, Frye, and others, and with mezzotint engraving in the nineteenth century; the work of Reynolds, J. M. W. Turner, the Wards, Cousins, Hirst, Miss Gulland and others; Mr. Davenport has provided a list of the more important works on mezzotint, a comprehensive index of the plates, and a general index.

A Rare Lowell Item.

One of the rarest of Lowell first editions is the little pamphlet, "The President's Policy," Philadelphia, 1864, a copy of which brought $28 at a sale held in the American Auction Rooms Dec. 4. It is a reprint from the North American Review, January, 1864, of Lowell's review of Lincoln's message to Congress of Dec. 6, 1863. Slightly revised, this review appeared in "My Study Windows," 1871, under the title of "Abraham Lincoln"; elaborately rewritten, it was given in No. 32 of Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s "Riverside Literature Series," together with Lincoln's Gettysburg speech, and also in the revised edition of Lowell's "Political Essays," 1890. Lowell referred to "The President's Policy" in a letter of Jan. 14, 1864, written to Richard Watson Gilder, regarding the Commemoration Ode: "The passage about Lincoln," he said, (Part VI., beginning "Such was he our Martyr-Chief,") was not in the Ode as originally recited, but added immediately after. More than eighteen months before, however, I had written about Lincoln in the North American Review an article which pleased him. I did Hyler Jim a service that most man of the Brahmin caste."

The Organ.

The third book in Charles Scribner's Boys' Musician-Story Series, edited by Frederick J. Crowest, to be published next week, is "The Story of the Organ," by C. F. Abdy Williams, M. A., Mus. Bac. The object of the book, writes the author in the preface, is to give an outline of the history of "that wonderful outcome of human ingenuity and skill which we commonly term the organ, by which, apart from its unique capabilities of kinship and rivalry in the first organ made by Chas. Mahn, of Hampstead, we are brought into a

THE HOLY LAND.

Turkish Conditions in Syria and Palestine.

IT is HOP to speak the past in Syria and Palestine in the present to which Mr. William Elmer Curtis refers in his attention. In a prior volume, "The Turk and His Lost Provinces," Mr. Curtis showed, by acquaintance with Eastern Europe, the Turk under notice. "To-day in Syria and Palestine," cannot be called optimistic. The tendency is leaving on the reader is fairly depressing. In his preface Mr. Curtis writes:

> As you pass through Palestine decrepit villages and deserted towns confront you in succession, and everywhere in every village is manifest a lack of life and energy and a condition that will give conscientious students of the Bible and its traditions.

It is in Jerusalem that the main interest of the religious world is centred. Alas! that in the sacred city "so many illusions are dispelled, so many ideals are shattered, so many cherished memories are violated, so much compassion is shaken. . . ." The economic point pervades every part of the community, which makes the living off pilgrims and tourists, and will find holy places and sacraments, and confiding people are willing to pay for the privilege of seeing them."

He thinks taken special notice of the Germans in the Turkish territory and welcomes their advent. They have certain advantages, he thinks, supposedly derived from the friendly relationship between the Kaiser and the Sultan. There is great jealousy between the Russian and the German. One author writes that "there always has been a feeling that every Russian who enters Turkey seems an enemy, but the Germans are received as friends." What predominates in the country is the Jew. If "cleanliness is next to godliness," then the inhabitants of Syria and Palestine stand to obtain in Paradise. When at Beirut some of the remarkable ways of the Turkish censor were discoverable. No maps, English or American, or translations of the Bible with the name "Armenia" were admissible." Kurdistan was the substitution. Brazil be a "republic" was scratched out. On the chart of northern Africa, it is the Sultan who still rules over the whole coast, including Egypt and Algeria.

Damascus is visible. Even for the last years contrasts the East and the West have had an emblem. There never has been a census taken of Damascus, but the population is estimated to be all the way from 250,000 to 500,000. There are many Christian establishments in the city. Mr. Curtis does not write in flattering terms of the Moslems of Damascus. He says, "while foreigners are safe in Damascus if they observe the proprieties, they are not allowed in several parts of the city and are apt to be insulted wherever they go. The Mohammedans of Damascus is most observant of his religion." His piety is measured by the number of times he says his prayers. "You see men sitting before the coffee counting their beads and moving their lips silently, with coffee cups at their sides, and the more dignified the man the more conspicuous was one of him." We are not to forget, it is in fact impossible to forget, the massacre of Damascus in 1860, when it is said 5,000 Christians were murdered.

In a chapter with the heading "By Bethlehem to the Grave of Noah," we are informed that in 1899 the French monkeys carrying the Damascus line will carry passengers to Mecca and the Lebanon Range. What will the trolley over permeate the most sacred of places on earth? Mr. Curtis writes:

> Are sentimental objections to all innovations in Palestine. People consider this holy ground, and sacrilegious, arbitrary political growth, and others interested in its antiquities and historical features are determined to endeavor the constructing of railroads and the introduction of telegraphs and cables. They would prefer to preserve all the ancient conditions and features and to restore the land as far as possible to the condition it was at the time of Christ or at least at the beginning of the Christian era.

Is Palestine to be converted into a Biblical museum? What, then, would be the condition of civilization? Religion would have lost to do in that guardianship than politics. There is Mecca, sacred to the followers of the Prophet. A German company has offered to build a railroad from Damascus to Mecca. Would there be good business in the transportation of 250,000 pilgrims per annum? The Sultan would never permit such an enterprise. At Beirut Mr. Curtis is unwilling to accept all the stories told him—that is, by the priest in charge of the sacred stone. He writes: "They give details that are not only unnecessary, but which seem even sacrilegious of Christian the street." As in the innumerable holy places the author says: "All the places are sentimental and treated by guardians, some of them accurately, perhaps, but nobody knows, for there is not the slightest tangible evidence that any of them were connected by actual association with the Redeemer of Men." Mr. Curtis is apparently wanting in that most desirable quality—faith. Considering it is in Jesus that now the Mount of Beatitudes, where Christ spoke the words of peace and love. There was fought by the Crusaders and Saladin the greatest of battles. The date of that conflict was 1187, and it was doubtful who triumphed, and from that time shall to-day the power of the Prophet in Palestine came to an end.

Considering Syria and Palestine statistically, it is evidently which is from the Mediterranean coast, with a population of 1,000,000 and EGYPT, from 10 to 12 per cent. of the land in cultivation. Egypt has to-day more adaptive power to the square mile. With better methods of cultivation it could do much more and a very much larger population. But the area of ground capable of cultivation is limited, and does not exceed 7,000 square miles. Studying the Zionist movement, Mr. Curtis doubts very much whether it can ever be successfully carried out. He asks:

> Who will crowd out the Bedouin Arabs and Fellahs, who own the land, and where will they go? And the Syrians and the Greeks, who will take the land from them? Who will stay the hands of the Druses and Maronites? They hate the Jews more than any other sect, and are the most fanatical of the battles in Christendom. The Jews get along better with the Moslems than with any other of their neighbors.

Examining the efforts made to help the Jews in Palestine, Baron Edmond Rothschild expended one million of dollars and he admits that the result was a failure. The author writes that the few Jews who remained converting themselves with agricultural work are not contented with their labors. As to the subject of missions in Jerusalem, Mr. Curtis writes: "I was not able to learn of a single Moslem convert to Christianity and of only two Jewish converts to Christianity, although I asked political questions of all the Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox Greek commissions I talk with." Our author recommends that there should be a mission directly interested in agriculture and home cleaning in Jerusalem. As to the people, "three-fourths of them get their living off pilgrims and tourists, who meet with swindlers and impositions at every site. The date of begin ruling is one of the most extensive and profitable industries."

Prosperity of Cook, is interesting to read Mr. Curtis's final opinion of Jerusalem. "Jerusalem is altogether an unlovely, uncomfortable, and repulsive place, and no one comes here without regret." It is not the Moslem, apparently, who makes so much trouble in Jerusalem. "The bitterness of the hate and rivalry of the sects is so great that none of them could be trusted to treat the others fairly if a Christian was sure to conceal, and although their manners are often offensive, the Moslems for a thousand years have always acted impartially and kept the scene of the burial and of the resurrection of the Saviour open to all on equal terms." The attitude of the recent disturbances occurred not long ago and was between the Greek monks and the Franciscans. It arose from the use of a broom used by a Franciscan. There was an ugly collision, the Greek priests using Grabalis. But, as Mr. Curtis writes: "The fight has been going on since the 15th century." To the Greek monks is given the credit of being "aggressive and vindictive," and predominating as to numbers. At the conclusion of the volume the Jordan and Dead Sea are described. Mr. Curtis declares the river to be an ugly and muddy stream.

College Men and Courses.

FREEHOLD COLLEGE QUESTIONS. Six Papers Read Before the National Education Association of the States Held in Boston, July 6 and 7, 1903, by Charles W. Eliot, President of Harvard University; Andrew F. West, Dean of the Graduate School, Princeton University; William R. Harper, President of the University of Chicago; Nicholas Murray Butler, President of Columbia University. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.

The question of the length of the college course, whether it shall be four years or three or two, and, if will be resolved, much thought out last Sunday. There are the papers in which the various sides of it were stated by men in authority. President Eliot explains the then Harvard system and theory of three years, Dean West stands up for the traditions of the old four-year course, and the other gentlemen advocate such modifications which have caused to fit conditions as they are discovered in the great centres of education situated respectively in Chicago and New York. President Harper and President Butler seem to agree in this, that while the four-year A. B. course ought to be retained for such as have the time for it, there should be a two-year course for the others who must pass with as little delay as possible into professional schools.

President Eliot goes upon the theory that the complete college course for the A. B. degree is the proper and normal stepping stone to the professional school, and considers the college, it appears, exclusively as a place carrying as such a stepping stone. Such a view is, as the others point out, essentially a university view. They call attention to the fact that it is after all only a small minority of college students who pass on to schools of medicine, and law, and the like, and argue that the normal college course should be arranged for the majority.

Preliminary papers by President Eliot and Dean West are concerned with the definition of the "cultivated man," as modern college product, as he should be, and the perils which in this country threaten what it has been traditional to call a "liberal education." A reading of the papers in sequence will be found to give any man interested for thought and reading of an idea of the prevailing breadth of the interests involved. The book ought at least to be read by college men who have not already followed the matter by the papers.

Fruits and Nuts.

"The American Horticultural Manual" is published by J. H. Budd, editorial Professor in Horticulture in the Iowa State College of Agriculture, and Prof. N. E. Hansen, who heads the same department in the South Dakota Agricultural College. (New York: John Wiley & Sons. $1.50 net.) Part I. included the leading principles and practices connected with the propagation and improvement of fruits. Only looking at Indian, shallow, and pivots, the author insists that South Africa can never have any agricultural importance. It might be that in the time to come it could feed its own Africanders, but nothing more. "If of its natural products it is to bring money to the country, it must be in its being some variety of fruit, by the pungent smelled which shall grow more in territory which, without its aid, is worthless, we found it necessary to go to war to force a remunerative Government to that particular quality." That is, if such a fruit curriculum, and Mr. Ransome also, "without entering South Africa, we do meet to the British Empire, would be valuable."

The writer's method of treating the question of black labor in South Africa is utterly devoid of sentiment. When you put in the front the "man and brother" theory and set the black man, by die, it does not turn out to be satisfactory. Experience shows, as Mr. Ransome relies, that you cannot employ a large number of Africans unless they are subjected to a certain amount. A Kafir has been known to gulp down diamonds worth $8,000 at a single swallow. In the gold mines such morals are not obtainable. "For a native never sees the gold at all, and to get $25 worth of gold he would have to eat several hundred pounds of pulverized rock."

Contact political or social possibilities are shown in the volume under notice. One is the dislike the Boer has for the German. This is carried so far that he rejects the goods "made in Germany." The idea originated in that there would have been no war but for the belief that Germany would espouse the cause of the Boer. So there has come about a stamp in the sale of German goods and machinery, and the United States is the only competitor England has.

The chapter on diamond mining is of an exciting interest. The world wants about seven and a half millions of dollars worth of diamonds every year, and South Africa can supply that demand. The De Beers Company pays a dividend of 40 per cent. The company controls the output. The methods of mining and the after processes for securing the diamonds are all clearly defined. In the blue earth each ordered of thirteen cubic feet ought to contain diamonds worth $20.

As to the possibilities of the Rand, Mr. Ransome writes that "the resources of the Rand are vastly in excess of the largest estimates of a few years ago, and that, as far as exhausting the supply is concerned, we have hardly yet done more than make a start in the business." Well-boring is constant in South Africa, for it has been found that, not far below the surface there is plenty of water. In Cape Town, for pumping purposes, the average sale of windmills is one every day in the year, and what is pleasant to learn is that they all come from the United States.

FACT AND FICTION.

Some Recent Views of Their Frequent Lack of Relationship.

THE WORLD OF W. W. JACOBS.—I wish that one might enter the Jacobs world now and then, instead of going to Switzerland, or Scotland, or the other dull countries where one makes formal holiday. But I fear it is not to be; I fear that the difference between fact and Mr. Jacobs's presentation of it will never be bridged. I have met with ancient villagers of country inns, and have filled their pipes and mugs with more spontaneity than the travelers in those stories, but I have heard no yarns resembling in point of humor "The Persecution of Bob Pretty" or "Odd Charges." I have listened to night watchmen, but they have told me no tales like "The Money Box" or "Bill's Lapse" or "The Third String." A lighterman at Rotherhithe (on the green balcony of the Angel) once told me a good story, but it is quite unfit for print and belongs peculiarly and painfully to our own world. I have heard the Captains of barges and wherries exchanging sarcasms, but they were for the most part merely beastly. It is sad, but true—the Jacobs world is not accessible. Even if one followed Mr. Jacobs about, I doubt whether one would come to it. If I had to name in a single word the difference between Mr. Jacobs's world and the world we are condemned to live in, I should say resourcefulness. In real life there is no such resourcefulness as among Mr. Jacobs's characters.—London Speaker.

HOW IT WOULD STRIKE A MARTIAN.—If we were to study the literature of some unknown country and were to discover that all the characters were described as possessing three legs and as preferring the happiness of their uncles to every other consideration, we should be decidedly interested; but if, on subsequently visiting the country in question, we found the inhabitants bipeds like any others, and their feelings toward their uncles quite normal and unimpassioned, our interest would be changed to bewilderment. It would seem to us incredible that a sane people should read vast masses of fiction which showed them as possessing qualities and feelings which they could not help knowing that they never had possessed, and should praise it for so misrepresenting them. We should simply consider those who tolerated such books stark mad. Yet we should but be looking at our own situation as it would appear to an intelligent Martian visiting this extraordinary planet. Take any normal English novel at random, and you will find that it misrepresents life not merely incidentally, but as systematically as if it assumed that men had three legs. The actions of its characters proceed unvaryingly on certain fixed axioms about human nature, of which no man can live in the world for ten days without discovering the entire falsehood. And yet those who read these novels seem never for an instant to feel the incongruity, though they know perfectly well that these axioms are nonsense, and would generally no more think of acting upon them, or expecting any one else to act upon them, than they would think of flying. Let me take an obvious example. There is no subject so constantly dealt with in novels as love. How do they treat of it? In nine-tenths of them it is tacitly or explicitly assumed that a man's whole future invariably depends on whether his love for a particular woman is returned or no. If it is, he lives happily ever after; if it is not, his life is blasted for all time. Yet those who read such tragedies and weep copiously over them would be puzzled to find one single example in real life where an unsuccessful love affair had meant more than about six months' depression to the sufferer.—Cecil Chesterton in The Outlook, London.

WOMEN AND ROMANCE.—Women are usually credited with a taste for romance, but facts hardly bear out this assumption. The division between the sexes is, indeed, practically that constituted by the old romantic controversy—so far, of course, only as their literary tastes are concerned. Where men lean to romance, women lean to a domestic realism, which is as obvious a realism as that of Zola. * * * When women lose the footing of realism, it is "what we dream" attracts them. Women have written tales of adventure and historical novels, but it is safe to say that their heart is not in such work, but in the domestic novel, with its photogravures of actual life, or in such stuff as dreams are made of; even to the extent and summit of, say, "Fiona Macleod." The relation is obvious. Writer and reader together can walk comfortably into those drawing rooms aforesaid, and feel that they are sharing the plot with the characters; while the subjectivity of "dreams" is palpable. It all works back to the old theory, that woman is subjective, and man objective. Woman's incursions into romance, therefore, are occasional, and usually of a personal color.—London Daily Chronicle.

SANE IF CRUDE FICTION.—This predominance of the novel fills the pessimists with alarm. Some of their deductions are positively terrifying. They say, in so many words, that reading to-day, if confined to fiction, contains, when undirected by wise selection, "all the elements of mental decay and deterioration." The chiefs in the fiction world have "taken to cap and bells." In the book world we are called to watch "the desperate evolutions of men and women who vie with one another in an effort to produce the odd, the grotesque, the salacious, or the exciting."

A good deal of such a contention is arrant nonsense. There is no harm in a novel because it is a novel. There are few better books than a good novel. In these days, when it is sure of its audience there is no limit to the lessons it may teach—moral, religious, educational, and industrial. Moreover, the undirected reader is quite as apt to stumble upon a good novel as a poor one—and more so, thanks to the good advice of the hard-working book reviewer and to the fact the publishers who advertise most heavily seldom put out a really inferior book.

One would think that the presses were throwing off bad novels by the ton. There are bad novels—bad in the sense that they are crude and false to life [illegible] moral—they are practically unknown in our American literature of to-day. Admitting the worst—that the American novel of to-day is "the apotheosis of the insignificant" and that our fiction is a dead level of mediocrity—it certainly is true that the American novel is sane, healthy, and clean.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Advice to Young Men.

A series of straightforward and practical talks with young men by the author of one who has already published several books intended to benefit those engaged in business pursuits. The present volume, addressed particularly to those who stand upon the threshold of the business life, shows the necessity of self-study, of weighing one's individual capabilities, and forming definite plans before entering any business.

The lines between success and failure having been joined, advice is given as to the cultivation of system, the recognition of the importance of details and other kindred subjects of interest to those starting out in life in the business world. The style is direct and personal, commanding attention, and holding it by frequent concrete illustrations of the truth of the arguments advanced, drawn from the lives of those whose success in life is recognized by all.

In all there are sixty-three chapters in the book, devoted to such topics as "The Country Boy's Opportunities," "Misfit Professions," "Just Getting Along," "Never Lost Up a Cent," "Trying Something for a While," "Tact," "The Art of Advertising," "The Timid Man," "The Educated Man," "System and Order," &c.

The title page calls attention to the fact that "character is the poor man's capital," and throughout the work high ethical standards are insisted on as a contributory cause of success. The following extract from the closing chapter sums up this side of the argument:

A man of the best type may see his property swept from him, his hopes blasted, his ambitions thwarted, but his spirit remains undaunted. His success is beyond the reach of mere accident of fire, of panic, or of temporary disaster; the foundation of his success is laid upon the eternal rock of truth, of justice, of probity, of high thinking, and square dealing, and no floods or misfortunes, of commercial devastations can reach him. They do not touch the real man, for his investments are in himself.

International Encyclopaedia.

The new International Encyclopaedia (Dodd, Mead & Co.) is now almost complete; in the last few weeks Volumes XII., XIII., and XIV. have been issued, and only three more are planned. This set is full of valuable information and biographical data.

Maximilian, Holy Roman Emperor from 1493 to 1519, ancestor of the Austrian house of Hapsburg, often called "The Last of the Knights," opens Volume XII.; the last entry is the New Jerusalem Church, the Swedenborgians. In discussing meat, diagrams are given showing what cuts there are and their names, in beef, veal, mutton, and pork; a table is added showing the average composition and food values of each cut of each of these meats, and of sausage, poultry, and game. The ten pages on mechanics mention most of the formulae needed in its study, with brief explanations, and illustrations of half a dozen of the most important. Metal-working machinery, only three pages long, has a full-page engraving and ten illustrations. Mexico, with its several sub-articles, archaeology, literature, war with America, State, City and Gulf of Mexico; its double-page map, and its picture of the Cathedral that cost $2,000,000 for the walls alone, and whose elaborately carved choir is valued at $1,500,000, fills nearly fifty columns, or twenty-five pages. Michelangelo Buonarroti's five-page biography is illustrated by full-page engravings of his heroic statue of the horned Moses and of a portion of his fresco in the Sistine Chapel of the Vatican, representing the "Creation of Adam." There are nearly forty pictures for the article on microscopes, showing all the latest elaborations of the instrument and many characteristic slides. An exhaustive story of the Christian missions fills over a dozen pages. Mohammedanism requires more than twenty pages; music gets twenty-five pages. The letter N begins on page 809 with "Naha or Nafa," a port of Japan. The history of Napoleon is condensed into a dozen pages.

The thirteenth volume begins with New Kensington, an iron town in Pennsylvania, contains the whole of text under the letter O, and ends with the Phigalian marbles taken from the temple of Apollo in Arcadia in 1812 and transferred to the British Museum. The most important entry in this volume is New York; of the twenty-seven maps there is one of New York State, one of Greater New York, a folding map of Manhattan, and one each of Brooklyn and the Bronx; two of the thirty-eight engravings and several woodcuts illustrate the fifteen pages devoted to the city, while the article on the State is of equal length. Special references tell of the City College, the New York Academy of Sciences, Historical Society, Public Library, and New York University. Of the other maps, eight are State maps, three are for provinces in Canada, eight are foreign countries, such as Orange River Colony and Palestine; Paris has a map, and one shows the ocean currents of the world and one the gas and petroleum fields in the United States. Niagara Falls, the Nile, the Cathedral of Notre Dame, Paris, and the Mount of Olives are some of the engravings. Of the seven colored plates, those showing peacocks and parrots are almost a blaze of color; that of the passion flowers is startlingly unusual.

The letter P is finished in Vol. XIV., which contains also the letter Q and R down to James Rice, the author, with Walter Besant, of "Ready Money Mortiboy." [illegible]

PHILIP SCHUYLER.

Bayard Tuckerman's Biography of the Revolutionary Soldier.*

GENERAL PHILIP SCHUYLER was not a lucky man, and it is a large part of the business of his present biographer to set forth the difficulties with which he has had to contend as commander of the Northern Department during the earlier years of the Revolution. The chief of these difficulties, we gather, was that Schuyler, a New Yorker and a Dutch aristocrat, had to command New England's troops, democratic and anti-Dutch. The Revolution, in the hands of John and Sam Adams, already at the last Gates was Schuyler's lot at Saratoga was this county. Mr. Tuckerman devotes himself, it may be explained, almost entirely to the public part of Schuyler's life, touching but lightly upon the private and domestic. Philip Schuyler had only Dutch blood in his veins.

Fourth in descent from Philip Pieterse, he was grandson of Cap. Johannes and son of Johannes Schuyler, Esq., and was born "on the Flatts" of Albany, Nov. 11, 1733, but his father died when he was a boy, and was brought up by his mother, Cornelia Van Cortlandt, partly at her house in Albany and partly at the Flatts, the country home of his sires.

The family of Schuyler, beginning with the Philip Pieterse above mentioned, who came from Amsterdam in 1650 and settled in Rensselaerwyck, had intermarried by twenty with the Van Rensselaers and the Van Cortlandts, and so the young man had all the advantages of social position which New York could give. Moreover, he inherited wealth and a sort of unofficial influence over the Dutch, though the Indian Commonwealth, formerly a Schuyler possession, had now been given to Sir William Johnson. Naturally, too, the boy had all the advantages of looking to the world and on the river which the time and country provided, and of "the education derived from books," he had more than most of the colony. He studied for three years with the Rev. Mr. Stoughton, the pastor of the Huguenot Church at New Rochelle, and learned there to speak French, an accomplishment in English-speaking America then as now. It was the same school to which some years later went John Jay. Of Schuyler's parents as a young man little is said, but here is a bit from an extract from a letter written by him at the time the first theatrical company came to New York:

After prayer our requests to the Governor and his lady, we bought our tickets for 8 shillings apiece of Parker & Weyman's printing office in Beaver Street on our return. We had the pit, which and before sundown we were in the theatre, for the players commenced at 6. The room was quite full already. Among the company was your cousin Tom and Kitty Livingston, and also Capt. Wade, Mr Peter Warren's brother-in-law, Mr. Peter Warren's brother-in-law. The curtain being before the players, till they were ready to begin, when on the hinge of a whistle it was raised, and some of them appeared and commenced action. The play was called "The Fatal Marriage, or the Unhappy Orphan," and was written by Mr Richard Hale, and Nancy's lady is acting. The Governor Nelson and his wife and sister all participated, and a sprightly young man named Hallet, played the violin and danced morrisky. I was not better pleased than I should be at all other times, but that I must I meet with some Scotch and hard heavy wine; savings which I hope profited me something.

This letter with its Sterlean subject and serious comment was written to "Pill Sc" or Alexander Van Brunck of Albany. In the next year Philip Schuyler came of age, and though he was the oldest surviving the English law in favor of the old Dutch custom, he divided the family estate equally among his mother's children. In 1755 he took part as a Cossack in the expedition to Crown Point in which Sir William Johnson defeated the French under the Baron Dieskau, and in the same year he married Catherine, daughter of John Van Rensselaer of Greenbush, the lady Elsie himself, a descendant of old Philip Pieterse Schuyler. The young officer's courtesy and kindness to the Baron Dieskau on a prisoner in the cemetery of letters from the Baron's aide de camp, which Mr. Tuckerman quotes. A little later Schuyler took part in another expedition against the French, led by Col. John Bradstreet, and took in the consolidation of Sam Adams against Ticonderoga. In this 18-foot campaign it was Schuyler who brought back the body of that gallant Lord Howe, who perished there—the other brother of the British General and admiral of the Revolution. A chapter concerning events from Schuyler's return in 1761 to England, where he was dispatched on official business by Col. Bradstreet.

It was in Fleetwoody that he sailed in a packet called the General Wolf. His passport and letters were applied at once in the study of navigation, and soon after the Capital dinner, the Mr. Delancy he had delivered received by his brother-in-law, Sir Peter Warren, and every to name an engagement. Schuyler was then but twenty-eight years of age, but experience had given him the bloom of maturity and self-reliance. He was a good and successful soldier, and the author of the Indian campaign. Though the war was over in America, it was still raging between England and France, and the General Wolf was captured by a French privateer, which put a Lieutenant and a prize crew aboard. Schuyler's knowledge of French got them out of the scrape, and he had been in Paris and Versailles, where he the prisoner and with were approaching a French port they were both taken by an English frigate. Thus Schuyler reached London in safety with his papers.

In the years immediately preceding the Revolution, New York, if asked with a more emphatic utterance of society than any other center, Virginia, was much divided in sentiment. Philip Schuyler was that a member of the Historical Association, and Gen. Wynn proposed that "our favorite poet be visitant committee" to the entertaining institution. Another of the toasts was George Clinton. It was during this period, too, that Col. Schuyler was the sitting M.-of. of the New Hampshire grants in New York. In the dispute between that colony and Mass. Schuyler was the president of the so-called "Independent Council," later created into the state of Vermont. Hunting also he was interesting himself in real estate and the improvement of the countryside, and doubtly acquiring in wealth.

Such a life, but very different from that of the young surveyor upon the banks of the Potomac, was the preparation of Philip Schuyler for his part in the war of the Revolution. When the Continental Congress resolved to fight, that body assigned to most velocity the posts of general officers in the army to be collected. Two Major Generals for New York Provincial Congress chose Philip Schuyler, with Richard Montgomery as Brigadier General. Then with the attempt to make an army of New England raw material began the troubles of this honest, Dutch-descended gentleman, harassed by the prejudices of his men and his own superiors, and diplomatic troubles. Washington was having the same kind of trouble with his raw material—the sturdy New Englanders—being Boston, and the two officers corresponded, commiserated. Washington could only commend to Schuyler the same patience which he was himself practicing. Schuyler replied that he would follow his chief's advice to the best of his powers, but he was not so well fitted for the role as the Virginian. Here is what the Rev. Cotton Mather Smith, whose father is his warmest, says about the New York officer in these days:

Gen. Schuyler is as earnest a patriot as any in our land, and he has few superiors in any respect. I do grieve that so many of our New England men should fail to do him justice. Yet they are not quite without excuse, not for their suspicions, but for their zeal. The General is a man of quick and ready parts. He has before been accustomed to young men that are reasonable well taught, and able to give a clear opinion and to state their grounds for it; yet were not certain of some wealth or rank, and our Dutchmen, O, came up to him without any problems, ready to offer his own judgments and advice, but without not disrespectfully. The General, albeit the information was of importance and should have speedy attention, spoke very sharply to the poor man and bade him depart. He could easily have seen that the man meant no harm and was far more intelligent than the most of his "stupid Dutchmen," (as I grieve to say that our New England men are apt to call 'em,) even when they are officers, but it was not till I had explained to him that the man was well descended and only a Mechanic, or rather, his grandfather's English estates had been forfeited to the Crown, that the General could be prevailed upon to listen to him.

On the other hand, to show the opinion of New Yorkers of their neighbors in Connecticut, Mr. Tuckerman quotes the will of Isaac Sawyer of Harmonsburg, who wrote in 1780:

It is my desire that my son, Gerrardus Sawyer, may have the best education that is to be had in Europe or America, but my mother will not agree to it, and I do not know but what it is best, as I'm Colony of Connecticut law, to should imbibe in big roots that low craft and cunning so inherent to the people of that country, which is so interwoven in their constitutions that all their art cannot disguise it from the unsullied eyes of religion, have endeavored to impress themselves on the world for honest men.

It may be observed that many of the Continental army came from Connecticut. Thus Schuyler had the cream. He fell sick and could not march with his army into Canada. Richard Montgomery had a part of it, though, as we all know, and when he fell, at the Plains of Abraham, Arnold kept up the siege of Quebec. At Montreal, on Montgomery's forward march, many New Englanders came home for their harvest fields and deserted southward. They arrived at Ticonderoga, where Schuyler was, and the General wrote to Congress:

About one of the boats passed in Connecticut passed here within a few days. An entire company, to a man, deserted. Three all entire force, to a man, deserted. Three all engagements for the Winter's service; and would to not one work done by them, distributed them on groups. Of all the specified over deserted by me, there is none to offender. He deserted the ship, and I hope, Gentlemen, he deserted the infantry, but if perhaps, the rest of the men, out of the ship, refuse to wait for him to go by way of Lake George, clung their heavy Boxes, cannot the will at the shore, the unfortunate the sacrifice of all other with the greatest good-will and alacrity.

It is not generally known by Mr. Tuckerman, nor do we know that the Revolution, that Schuyler or were afraid to fight, it was the Congress decision of the action the idle waiting the expedition into Canada, their work at home—and there was the fact, as Mr. Tuckerman tells, that New England did not find their Government of other quarters. At Ticonderoga, where Burgoyne's Canada detention were which required further, officers were very different, indeed. And it is authority which that these witnesses do not apply to regular Continental troops from New England—only to the militia. There is, indeed, yet many instances of some Virginia, and North Carolina militiamen who was some of one of the battles in the Eastern country where Mr. Gates was wounded.

From the point on the book is largely the history of the campaigns against Clinton and Burgoyne, with much of the letters of Mr. Horatio Gates, who was most of the time in Philadelphia, whispering into the ear of the Republican members of the Continental Congress—especially those from New England. Then comes Gates to the North to commander in Schuyler's place, the latterer having had successful time in the field of Gates and work done, Schuyler is for a court that Burgoyne's host in Albany, where Mr. Schuyler is most hospitable and gracious. Lady Ackerman, after being hospitably entertained at Albany, as at his own expense, leaves from the camp and appears in Congress as member from New York, and a sort of Acting Commissary of Supplies for Washington.

The history of the latest Dutch-descended gentleman after the Revolution is that of an ardent Federalist much interested in the politics of his son-in-law, Alexander Hamilton, and in the opening of Indian canals and waterways in the State of New York. He was elected to the United States Senate along with Rufus King when the State of New York adopted the Constitution. Then he was defeated by the gentleman whom Mr. Tuckerman calls "the wily Burr," but at the expiration of Burr's term the unanimously sent back to his seat. The death of Alexander Hamilton by the hand of Burr very much shattered the old man, who was devoted to his brilliant son-in-law, and soon after, in November, 1804, Philip Schuyler died, at the age of seventy-one. As his biographer says, very fitly:

He never, however, to himself and unequal the community in which his lot was cast paid in the Revolution which he had helped, owed its success, to stalling quickness of head and heart. Without genius, without extraordinary talent in any particular, he had that combination of ability and character which makes a trusted leader. A sincere love of country lay at the base of all his public actions.

A Thief's Chance.

"The Captain's Daughter," by Gordon Gordon Overton, will be highly commended as a book for the young person, for one only if it is undoubtedly proper reading, but it conveys quite a lesson excellent moral to young ladies rather overconfident of their own judgment in matters of importance. And this is not saying that the book will not be enjoyed by an older reader. The Captain's daughter, Miriam, discovers a thief in the act of taking some of the troop funds. She does not call for help, nor make her presence known, for the very reasonable reason that, in spite of the fact that she is a soldier's daughter, she is very much frightened. Afterwards it occurs to her how easily it might be to give the misguided young man the "chance" to mend his ways, and, after a short, quick, plot-stage, and thrilling hunt the thief is overtaken when the story is ended—not the interesting reader can feel pretty certain that when they both grow a little older Louis will probably undertake to offer Miriam the title, and she will probably do it better than on the first occasion.

Cattle Raisers.

The "Proceedings" of the sixth annual convention and the "Annual Report" of the National Live Stock Association, held at Kansas City, Mo., Jan. 13 to 16, 1903, have been officially compiled by Charles F. Martin, Secretary of the association, whose headquarters are in the Cudahy building, Omaha, Neb. The Proceedings occupies about seven a little more than a page, and reports and addresses were made about 100,000 the usual number of the expense to date in the interest of the Secretary, $5,000, and of the officers, William M. Springer, $2,000, John M. Burnett, the President, received $1,000 for expenses, and other first of lawyers and the court costs in the 7 suit litigation were not over $1,000. Thus the association's modest legislation bounty to cattle raisers in southern States was obtained was made to cancel to forty acres instead of twenty-acres, the time date entire may be extended to one, the half-dozen legislation of cattle was taught, and a bill was through Congress to transfer the Bureau of Animal Industry from the Treasury to the Agricultural Department. A bulletin of legislation cost of the year was issued for the convention, and during the convention Mr. Springer asked $5,000 for a legislative fund. The fund will be useful for a number of years of practical, clear, sane, as there are very many photographs furnished, though the International details are almost all. The old papers, and are about complete, and many of them are of permanent value. Prof. C. F. Curtiss of Iowa, one of the best general men in the United States on the subject, spoke of the "Insects Injurious to the Cattle" and the work of the Entomological experiment stations. The Hon. Jerry Simpson discussed interesting features of farm and ranch, and also told how he had created from a Populist into a stockman. President E. Wyman, United States Senator from Wyoming, answered an address on what Congress should do for the live stock industry and the necessity of the duty on meat and hides was endorsed by Col. John F. Hobbs of New York. The convention is strongly opposed to the merger of packing plants attempted by the Beef Trust, and the chief power of the session was the report of Judge Bishop on the attack of the packers fight against it.

BOOKS THAT SELL WELL.

Hugh Black, in a letter to Fleming H. Revell Company, the American publishers, writes that his new volume, "Work," is going there (in Edinburgh) very well. The first edition was 7,000, and they have been printed a second edition. The "Friendship" is said to be doing even better in this country.

Dr. David Gregg's "Individual Power as a Working Force," recently issued by Fleming H. Revell Company, is already of its second edition.

Henry Holt & Co. report that recently they had to send, on the same day, fresh sheets "American Politics" to press for its forty-ninth time, and Butler's "Greek Philosophy" for its seventh.

Mrs. Wiggin's "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," is reported to have reached its seventy-fifth thousand in America, while in England the first edition was all sold in advance of publication. The publishers, Houghton, Mifflin & Co., report a sixth edition of Olive Logan Sheehan's "Jewel," bringing the book into its twentieth thousand; the eighth edition of Andy Adams's "Log of a Cowboy," a seventh edition of "Schools, College, and Character," by President Briggs of Rochester College, formerly Dean of Harvard, and the second edition of Miss Sherwood's "Dorine."

A short time ago Dodd, Mead & Co. announced that they had received the third subscription from England for the fourth edition of Helen Keller's autobiography, "The Story of My Life." A week later the English publisher called for the fifth edition.

Among the novels that are selling steadily, although not a year or two, is the late Frank Norris's "Octopus," which is the story of the struggle of wheat growers and the railroads, and which preceded "The Pit."

"The Leonard's Spots," Thomas Dixon, Jr.'s, "twentieth century counterpart to the nineteenth century 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,'" is reported to be in its one hundred and twenty-fifth thousand. Dr. Dixon's "One Woman" has reached the ninetieth thousand copy.

The orders they received by A. S. Barnes & Co. this season for Goldsmith's "History of Rome" have brought the book up to its eleventh edition. The work treats of architecture, sculpture, painting, and music in one amply illustrated volume at a popular price and is a boon for use by students.

The J. B. Lippincott Company reports that "Pigs in Clover" has gone into a sixth edition and that the demand for it continues to be larger than when it first appeared.

The demand in the South for Prof. Guy Carleton Lee's "True History of the Civil War" is said to be very large. The book bears the imprint of the J. B. Lippincott Company.

Scribner's list of recent publications includes a number of splendid sellers. John Luther Long's "Madame Butterfly," which was brought out in October, is now in its 30th thousand; "Gordon Keith," by Thomas Nelson Page, which appeared in June, is now in its one hundred and twentieth thousand; F. Hopkinson Smith's "Colonel Carter's Christmas," was published late in October in an edition of 20,000, and the second edition of 10,000 books is nearly exhausted; Senator Hoar's "Autobiography of Seventy Years" is now in its third edition, although out only since Nov. 11, while the third edition of Gen. John B. Gordon's "Reminiscences of the Civil War" is half gone.

Memorial to an Indian Woman.

The Sacajawea Statue Association of Portland, Multnomah County, Ore., whose object is to commemorate the services of Sacajawea to Lewis and Clark on their expedition in the Pacific Coast, is to erect a bronze statue to the Indian Princess who led the expedition through the passes of the eastern slope of the Rockies, safely past the retreats of the Blackfoot Indians. The statue will be of heroic size, and the entire cost is not to exceed $7,000. It will be executed by a Western sculptor, Miss Alice Cooper, of Denver. The memorial will be erected temporarily on the Lewis and Clark centennial grounds, and later will be given a permanent place in one of the parks. Admirers of Sacajawea, those who have read Mrs. Eva Emery Dye's narrative of the expedition of Lewis and Clark, "The Conquest," will recall the character of the Indian woman. The book, by the way, which was published by A. C. McClurg & Co. of Chicago, in November, has gone into its third edition. This has a new frontispiece reproduced in color from a painting in oil by Ch. Weber. It portrays the session of St. Louis. The French Governor stands on the steps of the Government House. Near him are Capt. Lewis and Major Stoddard, to whom he has just handed over the keys on behalf of France.

The English Colonies.

Noah Brooks Spencer, author of a "Short History of British Colonial Policy," &c., has written an introduction to C. P. Lucas's "Historical Geography of the British Colonies," which is published at the Clarendon Press under the title "The British and Dutch of the English Colonies and of Other Spots of Government." This introduction has been written at the request of Mr. Lucas, the author's friend, who was killed in the recent Boxer troubles, in Pekin, and he has made it part of a new edition, the second, of his work. In view of the great interest centered in the colonies at the present time, this volume should find a ready sale.

Brooks Adams's "Law of Civilization and Decay," which was brought out in October, is now in its 20th thousand; "Gordon Keith," by Thomas Nelson Page, which appeared in June, is now in its one hundred and twentieth thousand; F. Hopkinson Smith's "Colonel Carter's Christmas," was published late in October in an edition of 20,000, and the second edition of 10,000 books is nearly exhausted; Senator Hoar's "Autobiography of Seventy Years" is now in its third edition, although out only since Nov. 11, while the third edition of Gen. John B. Gordon's "Reminiscences of the Civil War" is half gone.

Bryan's Artists.

"Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers" has been the standard source of information on the dates and lives of the artists with whom it deals for almost a century. First revised in 1849 by Stanley, and again in 1889 by Gilbey, it was almost rewritten and doubled in size by Graves and Armstrong, who finished their revision in 1903. A new edition has been begun under the supervision of Mr. George C. Williamson, which will be a complete revision in five large quarto, full of illustrations, bound in part-colored canvas. (New York: Macmillan. $6.40 net each.) During the fourteen years since the last edition many new names have become eligible for inclusion, and further researches and the preparation of numerous pictures have made many alterations necessary in the text.

The two volumes which have appeared so far bring the biographies down through the letter G. In Volume I. more than 100 changes have been made and seventy-two new sketches added. The first volume of the new edition out shows as Bangs, Gentile, and Giovanni Bellini, the famous Venetian, and his equally famous sons, established by Roger E. Fry; Gelée by F. Morris Perkins; Gerard Dou, by F. Burton, and others by Malcolm Bell; Boucher, Fred Madox Brown, Cambiaso, Children, Bramley, and others by the editor. There are shorter sketches of many others, such as Bandinelli, Blanchard, Blake, Bandini, Camuccini, Cammarano, &c. The volume ends with the name of Ludovic Cagnacci, an Italian painter of note, who died in 1620.

The second volume, which includes the letters D-G, has 150 new names, seventeen that were entirely rewritten, and nearly 200 separate corrections. Among the English artists who have died since the issue of the last edition, and whose lives appear in this volume, should be mentioned those of De Morgan, written by F. W. Wheylhe; Kate Greenaway, by G. Somes Layard; Sir John Gilbert, Birket Foster, and others. The long biography of Giorgione has been entirely rewritten by John Cartwright, the life of Dürer has been revised by Campbell Dodgson, that of Botticelli (Filipepi) by Miss Brewster, Sir Anthony Van Dyck by Lionel Cust, the Van Eyckes by Mr. Weale, &c. Of the many new additions the most important is that of Gerard, the great Frenchman, two specimens of whose work are given.

The type is large and clear, the two columns to the page make the lines short enough to be read with the greatest comfort, the wide margins and rough edges look very well. The binding is so good that the book stays open easily in spite of its thickness. But a marginal index would add greatly to the ease of reference.

Our State Government.

"The Government and Civil Institutions of New York State" is a textbook for children in the higher grades of school, written by Robert Lansing, an attorney at law, and Guy M. Jones, Principal of the Watertown (N. Y.) High School. The union of a lawyer and a teacher has resulted in a book that is easy to study and distinctly practical. Starting with the assumption that the student is already familiar with the general principles of government as well as the power of the Federal Government and the rights of the individuals, all discussion of these subjects is omitted here. In the main, the book is a critical and analytical study of the present Constitution of the State. The origin and growth of local government institutions are minutely considered; counties, municipalities, &c., treated, and the rules and purpose of judicial institutions thoroughly discussed.

A chapter is devoted to the growth of political parties and their place and importance in popular government, together with the ends of conducting primaries, conventions and elections; a concise discussion follows of ballot reform and carried into the book, a copy of the one used in the city during the campaign of McClellan against Hearst and the direct nomination ballot ticket. Pictures and diagrams are also given. The town government substitute is especially noteworthy, it is so compact and clear; the index, too, is thoroughly done. (New York: Silver, Burdett & Co. 48 cents.)

The Book of Children's Parties.

This is a book that ought to appeal to mothers who are compelled at intervals to output their brains to think up something to do at birthday parties, Christmas parties, St. Valentine parties—or any one of the numerous other effairs that must be made arrangements for this season. ("The Book of Children's Parties," by Mary and Sara White. New York: The Century Company. $1.) Here are all your parties arranged according to the seasons and to the months. The chapter on miscellaneous parties gives instructions concerning the Christmas tree, Santa Claus, St. Valentine's Day, Washington's birthday, Easter, Fourth of July, Hallowe'en, and Thanksgiving, also out-of-door parties for Summer, and lastly come the Arbutus parties, and for all of these are given the invitations to use, and with a list of the accessories to use, and menus adapted to youthful digestions. A very suggestive and valuable addition to the nursery outfit in this little volume.

Fox-Duffield Books.

The receipt of a holiday catalogue from Fox, Duffield & Co. of this city causes us to consider that this firm, which only began business last April, has had some notable successes. Its first book was a reprint of the amusing play, "Everyman," which is reported to have gone through several editions. This was followed by "The Adventuresome Age," a novel of a "Maid," revealed by Hutchins Hapgood. The third book was "The Man with the Wooden Face," a love story. The other books on their list have been described in these columns. These include "Rhymes of Real Children," illustrated by Jessie Willcox Smith; "The Forerunner," a novel by Helen Bayne, (Miss Fletcher Harper); "The Consequences of Life," by Old, Henry Wallgreen of Kansas City; "In Beverly Station," a collection of G. Allen Gilbert's portraits of women, and three or four other volumes. The holiday lists include all the books on the lists issued by this firm, as well as a number of calendars for 1904. The little pamphlet is illustrated with reproductions of pictures in the volumes.

Louis Tracy at Home.

The author of "The Wings of the Morning," Mr. Louis Tracy, has just returned from India. He is busily engaged in writing a new romance, which may be looked for in the Spring. It will bear the imprint of his American publisher, H. J. Clode.

Plans of Some of Them—Forthcoming New Books.

EMMANUEL A. STOKES Company announces the publication of a new Library of Standard Biographies. The first volume presents the whole ten books of Bourrienne's "Memoirs of Napoleon" in a condensed form. It contains all epigrammatic notes on Italy and a chronological list of events in the life of Napoleon. The second volume is to be "The Life and Times of Oliver Goldsmith," by John Forster, and will be the early form and book which was praised by Dickens and Carlyle, who thought Forster spoiled it when he extended it into "The Life and Letters of Oliver Goldsmith." The third volume will be Robert Southey's "Life of John Wesley." Other volumes are in preparation.

Charles Scribner's Sons have imported this month "Samuel Pepys, Lover of Music," by Sir Frederick Bridge of the University of London and organist of Westminster Abbey. This is an account of music in England in Pepys's time, showing the various points at which he touched the music of the day, and containing much curious historical information. There is a frontispiece portrait of Pepys in the book.

McClure, Phillips & Co. are publishing this week the new book by Miss Esther Singleton, author of "A Guide to the Opera," and a number of other volumes, on "French and English Furniture." It takes up all the distinctive styles and periods of furnishing and decoration in France and England, including the Jacobean, Louis XIII., Queen Anne, Louis XIV., Louis XV., Early Georgian, Chippendale, Louis XVI., Sheraton, Hepplewhite, Empire, and Adam. The seventy-two full-page engravings in the book are by H. D. Nicholls. They are the result of much research among rare volumes on cabinet-making and of study from original pieces.

The convenient popular edition of the Lewis and Clark Journals, which A. S. Barnes & Co. are publishing, will be ready next week in time to be available for those who are seeking standard holiday books of permanent value.

E. P. Dutton & Co. are publishing a new illustrated edition of Michael Fairless's "Road Reader," which appeared in February, 1902, in a small 12mo volume. This makes the eleventh impression of the celebrated little book, the contents of which first appeared in The Pilot. The new edition has six woodcuts by Will G. Mein. It is 12mo in size, and printed from the same plates as the first edition. The green cover has a design in white and gold of the "White Gate."

McClure, Phillips & Co. are publishing John La Farge's book, "Great Masters." It contains biographical and critical essays on Michelangelo, Raphael, Rembrandt, Rubens, Velasquez, Dürer, and Rodin. It is illustrated with sixty-seven full-page engravings, entirely covering the field of classic art.

Charles Scribner's Sons are bringing out in this country a new revised and much enlarged edition of Lewis F. Day's "Anatomy of Pattern," under the title "Pattern Design." The first edition was issued fifteen years ago. Fisher, revised and edited by Profs. Percy Groom and Isaac Bayley Balfour. The book is in five parts. As the author says in his Preface, it is "chiefly of a tentative nature, and attempts by a precise statement of pending questions to stimulate further research." The translation was just begun when Dr. Schimper died, and it appears without the modifications and improvements which he had intended to make. A portrait of the author and a sketch of his life and work have been prefixed to the present publication. There is also an index by Prof. Fisher. There are five collotypes, four maps, and 127 other illustrations.

The new and revised edition of Dr. William Hand Browne's history of Maryland contains new matter, including the treatment of the civil war. The author puts the case for the South with much force.

There are thirty-two colored illustrations in the book by John Tenniel. Only those portions of the text and pictures suitable for very young children have been used. The story is one-sixth the length of the original, but it reads continuously. The book is printed in large, clear type, and is size is a small 12mo, bound in red cloth. On the cover is a picture of White Rabbit.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. are issuing a holiday bulletin, with a number of illustrations from the books described. The make-up, price, &c., are given of over forty books in this little brochure of forty-four pages.

Ginn & Co. are publishing "Bacteria, Yeasts, and Molds in the Home," by Prof. H. W. Conn of Wesleyan University. The book is intended for practical use and is a popular, not a scientific, discussion. It is adapted to the needs of the housewife, the student of domestic science, and others interested in home economics. In an appendix are given directions for a series of experiments which will give the student some knowledge of the most important properties of micro-organisms.

The Clarendon Press is bringing out the second edition of "Cicero: Pro Milone," edited, with introduction and notes, by A. B. Poynton, M. A. The text of the speech is that made for A. C. Clark's volume in the series of Oxford Classical Texts.

Albert Brandt of Trenton, N. J., announces the publication of the first of two volumes on "Elegiac: Ancient and Modern, with an Introductory Study of the History of Elegiac Poetry, From the Earliest Days Down to the Present Time," by Miss Mary Lloyd. This is said to be the only anthology of the form of verse in the English language. It is the result of over fifteen years of study and search among the literatures of all peoples and of all ages. The introduction is a critical as well as historical study. Its plan is to trace the history of elegiac poetry back to its beginning as a part of the nature worship of primitive peoples; to show its development in Greek literature; to discuss Alexandrian elegies and compare them with others for which they have been the model.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. are issuing a new edition of "The Children's Book," edited by Horace E. Scudder. The new cover design is by Adrian C. Ivins. The artists of the many full-page pictures now added are Reynolds, Cruikshank, Gustave Doré and Boston Bennet.

The Clarendon Press is bringing out an "Introductory Treatise on Lie's Theory of Finite Continuous Transformation Groups," by Prof. John Edward Campbell. The book deals with the fundamental theorems of group theory, with the application of the theory to complete systems of three partial differential equations of the first order; the invariant theories associated with groups; the divisions of groups into certain great classes, with illustrations, with the theory of differential invariants, &c.

Where Truth Is Stranger Than Fiction.

The Chairman in this weekly says: "One of the most interesting and valuable monographs on early American affairs is a 'History of the Mississippi Valley from its Discovery to the End of Foreign Domination,' (A. S. Clark, 174 Fulton Street, New York City, $2.) by John R. Spears, in collaboration with A. M. Clark. The title page, giving to a good, old-fashioned way a tolerably view of the contents, describes the book as 'a narrative of the founding of its empire, drawn of current myth and enlivened by the thrilling adventures of discoverers, pioneers, frontiersmen, Indian fighters, and boatmenbers, with few-scale illustrations of historic places, maps, and portraits.' The narrative passes over the controversy points of the Spaniards and begins with the French century or late, who, as we are translated, in the days when Massachusetts settlers were pushing northward into New Hampshire and the Virginians were sending out an exploring expedition to find out whether a river really flowed into Delaware Bay, were already negotiating with the Indians of Wisconsin; and while the Dutch of New Amsterdam were trading with the Indians at Albany, were hurrying with the Sioux on the banks of the Mississippi; and a little later, when the English were taking New York from the Dutch, were under La Salle, ascending a line of forts from the St. Lawrence to the mouth of the Mississippi. It is a story full of romance and of heroic effort, though it is a story of failure. This account of French exploration follows naturally Parkman's classic narrative; then a chapter is given to the Spaniards in the valley and another to the effort of Pontiac's war on the settlements there. The rest is the story of the gradual Anglo-Saxon invasion, with full justice done for perhaps the first time to the Quakers and Moravians of Gnadenhutten, though George Rogers Clark is naturally the central figure. With the Louisiana Purchase the story ends, though we hardly need the publisher's assurance that the book was written as a permanent contribution to history and not with an eye to the anniversary of that event about to be celebrated at St. Louis. This brought the Mississippi Valley at last into the control of a people who knew what to do with it. 'The all of things,' says Mr. Spears, as the final word of his introduction, 'is an infinite composition of the work Do Dat. Where the French had sent for traders the Americans came with their families and their household. They first made the country their home. Even the English, during the brief interim of their control, still accounted the country, in Franklin's words, 'beyond the reach of profitable commerce.' It was, as he says at the close, 'because a new race had been originated on the American Continent—a race of whom it could be said "the things that is given it to do to one makes itself do"—the period of foreign control was limited. With a "blinkard dazzlement and staggerings in and fro" as of a man sent on an errand he is too weak for by a path he cannot find, this race had reached out and cramped the mighty valley from brim to brim. These words illustrate Mr. Spears's style, they explain his spirit, and also the dedication of the volume to the author of the 'Winning of the West' and of 'The Statesman Idea,' President Theodore Roosevelt."

FORE-RUNNER
By NEITH BOYCE

Among the new writers this year there is probably no other American writer who has caused a more distinct success than Neith Boyce in The Forerunner.—The Commercial Advertiser.

In case there remains any doubt, though this hardly seems possible, regarding the merits of poems of which we consider The Forerunner worthy, we repeat, the above protest to the introspective and subjective in literature, it will be of special interest and use but to scientific men.—Boston Evening Bulletin.

SKETCHES BY RUS.

All of the stories in this collection have been published before, either in one or the other of the magazines or in the newspapers on which the author served as a police news reporter for many years. They are essentially newspaper "stories," written by a newspaper man from the newspaper point of view, in that all of them contain a large element of news and each records some happening in the daily life of the city. But most of them are what in newspaper parlance are known as "human interest" stories, which not necessarily depend for their attractiveness upon the knowledge and the sympathy for the subject of the reporter.

Mr. Bill knows that district sometimes rather vaguely referred to as "the east side"; he has shown in ways other than the writing of stories his sympathy for those who live there. As a consequence this collection between covers of what otherwise might have been lost to many in the files of a newspaper is not without value to those who willingness to help in one or another of the many agencies for improving the conditions in the tenements is greater than their actual knowledge of the circumstances and the environment which need improvement.

As literature, pure and simple, to be judged solely by literary standards, the stories are not in any degree remarkable; as revelations of the life of a certain section of a large community they have, perhaps, more right to preservation than Arthur Morrison's much more literary collection, "Tales of Mean Streets."

A Very Rude Book.

THE LITERARY GUILLOTINE. An Authentic Report of the Proceedings before the Literary Court of Last Resort in the District of North America. Illus. 12mo. Pp. 200. New York: John Lane. $1.

In the nature of things this book of somewhat daring literary personalities is chiefly interesting at a glance. The place in question is the little array of those who make a living by writing books and other things in the City of New York. We may call them, for convenience, authors and critics. Parts of the present generation of literary men "feeling" will bring smiles to the visages of most people who read current books and magazines, other parts of it are understandable only to the members of the craft by the Bangemen to the skirts of it—those who sit in editorial sanctums in the metropolis or those who stand outside and wait humbly, hat and typewritten manuscripts in hand, people whose lives are more familiar to the editor by their their works are to the public.

Yet there are in the "Literary Guillotine" some fine sketches of matter, some eye-kindling half truths about the writers of books, some hitting of the critical ball on the head in a manner of accuracy which may cause specialists to applaud and policemen to smile, but give pain to innumerable men and women who evil literary practices or under literary circumstances. Attention be temporarily of authors, it may without here to quote some stray bits whose wit is amply apology for any problem or positive harmful or unkindness. Thus, when Alpha gentleman whom nominally embracing both literature and theology are before the judgment seat, where perches Mark Twain with Oliver Herford and the unknown, a Brooklyn chairman is made to define genius as "Infinite capacity for taking broken." In another place, where the "Pittsburgh gentleman from Indiana" and many other heroes of pictorial romance are gathered together with Hugh Wynne, there is question of one who bore experience signifying "abundance" in his tent, and this is said: "A digestive well is hard is worth two in a mansion." It may be brilliant to say wisdom and when a book like this can hit the truth, but it is the concern of the play to "up and say" boldly then sometimes that it is, in spots, extremely witty.

An Inhuman Father.

JOHN MAXWELL'S MARRIAGE. By Stephen Gwynn. In one volume. Pp. 348. Cloth. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

The unhappy fathers who is willing to sell his daughter to a man belonge a merchant upon the paternal estate in an ancient and well-read place of Wicklow-Gentleman, but too much wealth, however, to fall of being rent market in John Maxwell's marriage—the one he didn't make, and the one he did. In this case the father is more than unfeeling; he is the type of man to whom anger means tyranny; who insults, despoils, crushes everything that comes between him and his purpose; who unless the first of his family and descendants one long terror. Such men, though happily rare, are not impossible, but the extent of James Maxwell's brutality does seem rather or beyond the bounds of belief. He has jumped, however, to the North of Ireland and to the nineteenth century, and Mr. Gwynn sets him so vividly before us that we have no choice but to accept him—and to hate him accordingly.

All the characters are clear-cut and very much alive, and all command interest in themselves and their unequal fates. The unfortunate Isabella is well portrayed as her father's daughter, and she recognizes in her a difficult piece of instrumentality cleverly done. The author may not have intended Mary to be equally the daughter of her mother, but the reader is quite aware of more than a message of the unfortunate Isabella. "John Maxwell's Marriage" bears the earmarks of a story laid from the outsider. There are no shrewd analyses, no subtleties. It is one long line of the plot, which is a business matter in a novel which, if it be not a business matter in a novel, is a very good one. Mr. Gwynn's characters are vitally original, the tale strong and striking, arresting the reader from the first and not letting him go until the last word is reached. A single scene is almost too repulsive; the same end might have been reached without the physical outrage which the author employs. The "happy court" is, however, thoroughly great and clever, and the evolution of character in John Maxwell, during from his abhorrence of himself, is a fine conception. Incidentally, one learns something of the condition of Northern Ireland during the latter half of the eighteenth century; and, should the reader be a Protestant, he is in way of gaining a wholesome religious liberality.

Love Requited at Last.

THE KEY OF PARADISE. By Robert Fleming. In one volume. Pp. 348. Illus. Cloth. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

The key of paradise is mutual love, and this fascinating story of Roman life tells of a child of fifteen, married from her convent school, who, losing from her first ideal, finds the man, chosen for her, learns to know "the bitterness of love disdained, the cruel woman, the unmoved woman, the painted paltrons in danger," and finds the key in her hand, the sacred gates opening before her, her freedom won, only after long years of misunderstanding, of anxiety, of longs only less hard than that of the patient Griselda.

Why her romantic love did not crumble into dust is a mystery, and it really seems as though, even in Italian society, just a little plain speaking might have saved some painful pages, but the drama is well played, the Italian setting admirable, and the trials of "the fair Princess" only the medium for the reader's tranquility. One doubts whether her Prince was worth it all, and whether her paradise did not prove a prison in the end. But there are romantic reflections. Certainly we tread enough thorny and difficult paths with the Princess to be willing to yield ourselves to the belief that we have come the end of her troubles and tribulations.

As a picture of society in Rome in the Winter of "eighteen two," when the peace filled the city with English, and when feelings for and against the French ran high, the story is at once picturesque and vivid. Altogether, it is full of action and of passion, and will be read with much interest.

A Book of Aspirations.

THE LIFE RADIANT. By Lilian Whiting. 12mo. Pp. 218. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.

The doctrine that the mortal body is no more than a temporary instrument in the hands of the spirit is one which has more theoretical adherents than practitioners. The "life radiant" of the title is that which the author conceives will result from the practical recognition of the fact that the real man is neither a creature of earth than of flesh. Naturally it is the religious aspect of this conception which is presented. The spiritual life is God, it interpenetrates the finite life as the other does the greater elements of the universe, finite spirits to spirit across the fullness of the void, and, immortality, telepathy in the future realism of all communication whether of an intellectual, moral, or business character.

As much the author states in terms. Talk will presently be on checkers as chain arrows, writing instruments will be relegated with flint arrow heads to the Metropolitan Museum. For illustration of its spiritual emoluments the book relies chiefly upon the two things—quotations from Emerson and Phillips Brooks and rather highly colored allusions to the latest scientific effects of transcendental tendency. Much is made of the wonders of "thermists," of radium, of wireless telegraphy, and scientific gentlemen of repute are quoted indiscriminately with the daily papers. It may be added that the result is the citation of a medley of facts of acknowledged standing and other things of a very dubious scientific value. However, as has been said, the author is used merely as illustration. The "Life Radiant" is the life which regards the little troubles of this world as unworthy of serious thought, or used as means of refinement for the spirit. In time has a will to develop his spiritual sight so as see far into the future.

A Refined Heroine.

It is plain that the author is not afraid to challenge comparisons, or he would not have chosen the title he did choose. However, his book is, one doubts, intended for what the characteristics of children have dubbed "youths." The story is all about a search for hidden treasure upon an island off the Cuban coast and the complications which ensue from having the celebrated New Orleans Mafia mixed up in the business. Rendered Helen and the Vandals, a bluff sea captain, bound Anglo-Saxon sailor, treacherous Italians in masked caps and a storm at sea in which a ship that an hay-cream oven, with all sails and and those that on the water, long enough for the hero to travel from one end to the other of the deck, carrying the treasure with his bride as its guest. This here is a "rollicker" and a enlivening book. The heroine is described as "a tall brunette, about twenty years of age, with a stately, queenly bearing of confidence." This only relieves the attentions of the young sailor hero with beautiful quietness and unusual courtesy" and quite as the author intends, the reader is left to imagine what a refined heroine is.

Harper Book Notes

In choosing Christmas gifts a few suggestions of books of permanent interest and value may be helpful:

AKEYSTONE OF EMPIRE

The anonymous author of "The Martyrdom of an Empress" has applied her intimate personal knowledge of the Austrian Court and her delightful literary style to the production of a book which reads like a romance, but gains added value and charm from the fact that it is true. Rare illustrations add to the vividness of this story of the Emperor Joseph's eventful career.

PORTRAITS THE 60'S

A book of reminiscences by Justin McCarthy, bringing before those of the present generation likenesses of men and women who were famous or conspicuous half a century ago. A book of rare permanent value, gaining added interest with every passing year. There were few men of importance in the century just flown whom this veteran author failed to meet and know.

THE DUTCH FOUNDING of NEW YORK

Thomas A. Janvier is the final authority in matters pertaining to the city's early history. No one has a better right to supersede old Diedrich Knickerbocker as annalist of our early founders. The book is charming as well as accurate, delightfully entertaining as well as authoritative, and is profusely illustrated with old documents and rare prints.

A HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

The most complete narrative history of the American people ever written. President Woodrow Wilson has devoted the best years of his life to the preparation of this great work. Every byway has been searched for illustrative material, and as a result these five volumes comprise the most valuable addition conceivable to the library.

THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE

Senator Beveridge, who months spent in travelling through the far East, has written a book on questions of vital import which are agitating world politics to-day. It is an authoritative consideration of the Russian problem, with a discussion of that country's relations to China, Japan, etc., and to the United States. A work of unusual importance.

Ebenezer Jones. Of Welsh parentage and descent, he was born in Islington in 1820 and died in London in 1860. Much has been written upon the poet, both in his relation to the Socialistic movements in which he participated and in literary criticism of his two—at one time much-discussed—volumes, "Studies of Sensation and Event," 1855, and "Studies of Sensation and Consent," 1856; but the best critical summary of his labors is that of William T. Linton, in Stedman's "Poets and Poetry of the Century," Volume 5. "After the publication of these works he devoted himself to prose writing on political subjects.

"'Tears idl. ever wait to demonstrate your love,
But why did you kick me down stairs?'

"The Pretzel," (Act I., Scene I.,) by John Philip Sousa, contains the lines:

"Perhaps it was right to demonstrate your love,
But—why did you kick me down stairs?"

They are altered from Isaac Bickerstaff's "'Tis well 'tis no worse." The second quotation is from Hamlet's speech to the players, (Hamlet, Act III., Scene II.) "Now this, sweetness, or some thing off, though it make the unskillful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve."

"F. G. B.," Charlotte, N. C.:—"Where can I get complete information about Bull Run, Chicago? Where can I get a history of the University of Oxford, England?"

Jane Addams's "Bull Run Maps and Papers," (T. Y. Crowell & Co., $2.50); the Hon. G. C. Brodrick's "University of Oxford," (Longmans, Green & Co., 60 cents.)

"GEORGE L.," 22 Fifth Avenue, New York City:—"Dr. Holmes's poem, 'The Chalice of Life,' was read, and has the additional column a verse (quoted). In which of his works can I find it? Where can I find the title of Mrs. Hemans's 'Poetical Works?'"

Johnson said: "A ship is worse than a gaol. There is, in a gaol, better air, better company, better convenience of every kind; and a ship has the additional disadvantage of being in danger." See Boswell's "Life," under date of March 15, 1776. The title of Mrs. Hemans's book of poems is taken from Tennyson's "In Memoriam," XLVIII.:

"Dear souls, but spirits fledge of race, that die

JOHN FALLON, Deer Park, Md.:—"Can you direct me to a practical book on Oriental rugs?"

"Oriental Rugs," by John Kimberly Mumford, (Charles Scribner's Sons, $7.50.) also "Oriental Rugs," by W. D. Sheraman, (Dodd, Mead & Co., $2.50.)

F. A. BIRKMAN, 221 Pacific Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.:—"From whom and at what price can I obtain a copy of Prof. Perry's Memoir of Tom Paine, and a complete publication of Paine's 1776?"

"Spinning Tops," by John Perry, (H. & J. B. Young, New York City, $1.)

"E. T. M.," 224 West One Hundred and Sixth Street, New York City:—"I should like to obtain the address delivered by Hon. Horace J. Phelps at the Addession of the Rev. Phelps's monument in Stockbridge, Mass., the Rev. Phelps's address over that pioneer teacher."

See his "Orations and Essays," edited by J. D. McCullough, (Harper & Brothers, $1.50.)

"T. N. J.," 224 Broadway, New York City:—"Who is the author of 'A Friendly Address to All Reasonable Americans' and 'The American Oracle,' as well as of the anti-Revolutionary pamphlets referred to by our correspondent, which were so extensively circulated in New York and Connecticut during the Winter of 1774-5. Soon after the battle of Lexington, Wilkins, with other prominent Tories, escaped the fury of the New York patriots by taking refuge on board a British vessel of war, in which he sailed for England. The "Farmer" pamphlets were once attributed to Samuel Seabury, rector of Westchester before the Revolution and later Bishop of Connecticut, this impression, together with some positive proof of his Toryism, leading to his arrest and imprisonment in New Haven in November, 1776.

E. WITT, 96 East One Hundred and Twenty-ninth Street, New York City:—"Where can I get a book describing the history of Germany from the beginning of the Middle Ages to the present time, with general outlines of its small principalities?"

Read Charlton T. Lewis's "History of Germany," (founded on Müller,) published by the American Book Company, $1.20; Bayard Gould's "Germany, Past and Present," (Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.50;) "Germany," by Gould and Gibson, (Story of the Nations Series, G. Putnam's, $1.50;) Menzel's "History of Germany," (Bohn's Series,) is the best work for the general reader, (Bohn's Library, the Macmillan Company, three volumes, each $1.) &c.

"E. D.," Montclair, N. J.:—"Have not we seen the story?"

Jack London was born in San Francisco Jan. 12, 1876. From his fourth to his ninth year he lived on California ranches. His family then removed to Oakland, Cal., which, with the exception of some time spent in travelling, has continued to be his home. His travels have been mainly of an adventurous nature, and have extended over the United States and Canada by land, and to the Japan by sea. He has tramped with tramps in search of sociological data, and he spent a year in the Yukon region, (1897-8) a Sunday in the slums of London, (1902.) So. He attended the University of California for a short time, but most of his studying has been done at home. His books include: The Son of the Wolf; Tales of the Far North," 1900, (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., $1.50;) "The God of His Father, and Other Stories," 1901, (McClure, Phillips & Co., $1.50;) "The Children of the Frost," 1902, (the Macmillan Company, $1.50;) "The Call of the Wild," 1903, (Macmillan, $1.50,) and "The Children of the Abyss," 1903, (Macmillan, $1.50.) "The Kempton-Wace Letters," of which he is said to be part author, is also issued by Macmillan, 1903, $1.50.

"S. M. H.," Williamstown, Mass.:—"In writing an essay on the present younger generation of writers in England, I quoted Kipling (in The Yellow Book, for Autumn,) what was supposed your opinion, to be limited to six world-famous poets. Kipling's notes in writing such an article and I am at a loss to know whom to choose, and, having chosen, where to obtain material regarding them."

Among the "youngest" writers the following names might be suggested: Kenneth Grahame, Lionel Johnson, Richard Le Gallienne, Stephen Phillips, Arthur Symons and W. B. Yeats. See William Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation," (John Lane, $2;) the English "Who's Who" for 1904, (the Macmillan Company, $1.25) &c.

"J. M. W.," New York City:—"Kindly name some books on poultry raising for profit."

"American Standard of Perfection," (Orange Judd & Co., $1;) G. C. Watson's "Farm Poultry," (the Macmillan Company, $1.25.) &c. See also the various poultry journals, and "The Poultry Book," now being issued in parts by Doubleday, Page & Co., of whom inquiries concerning this work should be made.

"M. A. K.," Brooklyn, N. Y.:—"Where can I obtain the works of Rochefoucauld?"

"Y.," Chicago, Conn.:—"Between 1820 and 1864 essays by A. C. Bishop on Shakespeare's Dramatic characters were published in the American Journal of Insanity. Were these essays ever reprinted?"

They were published in New York City in 1869 under the title of "Shakespeare's Delineations of Insanity, Imbecility, and Suicide."

He contributed to The Fortnightly Review and other periodicals from 1866. His essay on "Winckelmann" was published in The Westminster Review for January, 1867, but attention was first drawn to him by his essays on The Renaissance in 1873, 1876, and 1877, on Leonardo da Vinci, Botticelli, Michael Angelo, and others. The latter were reprinted in the memorable volume entitled "Studies in the History of the Renaissance," 1873. After a silence of twelve years came, in 1885, his romance of "Marius the Epicurean," the work by which Pater will probably be known to posterity. Then came "Imaginary Portraits," 1887; "Appreciations," 1889, &c.

ALEXANDER E. ROSS, 220 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.:—"Where can I obtain Felix Dahn's historical novel relating to the early struggle for the possession of Rome? It is mentioned favorably in 'The Rulers of the South,' by Marion Crawford, who calls it also the 'Dahn.'"

This is Dahn's other romance, "Der Kampf um Rom." ("The Struggle for Rome.") published in 1876 in four volumes. We are not aware of any available English translation, but German editions are easily obtainable.

T. S. AFFECK, 22 Adderal Avenue, Roxbury, Jr. L. N. Y.:—"Which Greek orchestra does Grant (not day but when he delivering Rome from the hand no worthy notice does?"

Frizewell notes that these lines are to be found in an old scrapbook in the British Museum, ("Albion," Anderson David Krieg,") circa 1868. It has been stated that the author was Thomas Moore, an English writer of the latter part of the seventeenth century. A correspondent of The Historical Notes and Queries noted in 1882 that he thought was "evidently borrowed from the well-known lament of the Emperor Titus Vespasian, 'Diem perdidi.'"

"S. S. S.," Fort Huron, Mich.:—"Is Jacob Riis a naturalized American citizen? Can you refer me to any article or book containing official statistics of Robert Browning's 'Children Chaunt?'"

(1) Yes. (2) See the paper by J. Cotter Morison in "Browning Society Papers," (the Macmillan Company, $2.)

"F. J. CHAPMAN, Burton, Penn.:—"Can you give me a copy of Tolley Milton, the Indian poem? or do you recall the name of the author of several books, mostly, I think, of a novel of Jewish character. Where and when was he born, where did he die, and what are the titles of some of his works?"

Thomas Miller, the English poet, novelist, and writer on rural life, known as "The Basket Maker," was born at Gainsborough, England, Aug. 21, 1807, and died in London, Oct. 24, 1874. At an early age he was apprenticed to a basketmaker, and while that occupied in 1837 made the acquaintance of Thomas Hood, who encouraged him to publish a volume of verses, which appeared the following year under the title of "Songs of the Sea Nymphs." Among his other works are: "Royston Gower; or, Days of King John," 1846, (a novel;) "Rural Sketches," in verse, 1849; "Gideon Giles, the Roper," and "Godfrey Malvern," novels, 1853 and 1854-5, respectively, and "History of the Anglo-Saxons, from the Settlement to the Norman Conquest," 1861.

THE BOOKMAN,
HISTORICAL ROOMS,
Fifth Avenue, New York.

April 17th, 1903.

My Dear Mr. Pinder:—

I have now had time to read the volume of your "WANDERING MINSTRELS, SOLDIERS AND HIS COMRADES," and have derived from the reading a great deal of information and entertainment. Of course I have nothing to say as to authenticity of the anecdotes, but as we were to be mere spectators, I should say that a book of this kind has an unmeasured place in the publishing world. Yours, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Mackay, Mr. Piatnoff, The Prince Kropotkin is such an odyssey to the world at large as gives unusual value to anything which sheds clear light upon his personality.

I have read in the press the statement that "Kropotkin has been a hard nut to crack" upon the ground of the alleged impropriety of certain portions of it; but after having read it through I do not see that there has been an objection could be sustained. Hints and there certain passages might perhaps be mentioned but, if so, it would be done as a matter of taste, for, as all is a matter of morals, for I do not see that the question of morality can be raised in connection with anything that has been written in this book. In fact, it seems to me a minutely detailed authentic and curious autobiography of the life and adventures of one of the most interesting figures in contemporary history. Very sincerely yours,

HARRY THURSTON PECK.

ABOUT AUTHORS.

What Some of Them Are Saying, Writing, or Planning.

"RICHARD DALLAS," who relates "the story of a crime," entitled "A Master Hand," which is published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, has now confessed that he is N. Winslow Williams, a Baltimore lawyer, diplomat, and society man. Mr. Williams has written from experience in the office of the late Charles G. Keer, ex-one State Attorney of Maryland. He has contributed a number of short stories to Southern magazines. He is a graduate of Columbia Law School and senior member of the law firm of Williams, Thomas & Williams, attorneys. He is also a member of the Maryland Club, the Elk Ridge Fox Hunting Club, the Bachelors' Cotillion Club, and other leading Baltimore social organizations. "A Master Hand" has been printed in German.

N. Hudson Moore, author of "The Old China Book" and "The Old Furniture Book," published by the Frederick A. Stokes Company, is a woman—not a man, as seems generally to be taken for granted. Mrs. Moore was asked recently what was the most exciting part of a writer's life, and immediately answered that it was "the arrival of the postman!" However, she continued, "the most interesting part is the traveling about visiting private and public collections, finding an unexpected rarity here and unearthing some choice bit there, reading old manuscripts, town records, wills, and letters, which are the most trustworthy records we have of Colonial days and ways."

George Gary Eggleston has just finished a new story, described as peculiarly fresh and timely in its interest, which will be published early in the year by A. S. Barnes & Co.

Lewis Sentz, author of the verses in "The Life of a Wooden Doll," a book for children published by Fox, Duffield & Co., must have derived much amusement from that book by gathering into groups for illustrations the miniature sofas, automobiles, telephones, dishes, chickens, dolls, &c. Incidentally, the pictures are suggestive to a bright boy or girl.

Dr. Morton Grinnell, the naturalist, whose book, "Neighbors of Field, Wood, and Stream," has been very successful, according to the Frederick A. Stokes Company, has three very young wild animals who, from the latest accounts, climb over him, and show evidence of affection. He found them in a hole which he discovered recently. The creatures were born with closed eyes. They were thought to be otters, coons, minks, woodchucks, and polecats. They were nursed by a cat, and after Dr. Grinnell had them a month he learned that they were gray foxes.

Ernest Crosby's recent article in The Craftsman on "Shakespeare's Attitude to the Working Classes" has been translated into Russian by Count Leo Tolstoi. The Russian novelist told a visitor recently that he had never sympathized with the Avon bard, and that Mr. Crosby's article had for the first time disclosed the reason to him. Mr. Crosby is the author of "Tolstoi and His Message," published by the Funk & Wagnalls Company.

T. Jenkins Hains, the author, arrived in Norfolk, Va., on his yacht, the Hina, a few days ago. Mr. Hains is on a voyage to the West Indies, and expects to visit all the principal ports on the way down.

Leon H. Vincent is writing a volume that will be of interest to lovers of our native literature. It will be entitled "American Literary Masters" and will be published next year by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Edwin Markham, in the introduction to Miss Alice Jennings's collection of poems, "The Fruit of the Spirit," just published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, says: "It is good to know that this volume of selections is going out to the world. Here are rich stories of the heart's wisdom gathered from all realms of poesy. So far as I know, this book is unique; and I dare say it will appeal to a widening circle of readers alive to the serious interests of the spiritual life."

Addy Adams, author of "The Log of a Cowboy," has sent to Houghton, Mifflin & Co. a romance of old Texas, to be called "A Texas Matchmaker."

Samuel L. Bowman will have in the January Harper an illustrated article on "The Slave Market at Magnolia," in Moscow, where slave trading still goes on as it did years ago.

Henry D. Sedgwick, Jr., author of "Essays on Great Writers," is now at work upon a life of Francis Parkman, which will be added shortly to the American Men of Letters Series by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Dr. Denis Wortman, author of "Religion of the Christ," will issue soon through the Fleming H. Revell Company an epic poem entitled "The Divine Procession." It is said to be elaborate and substantial. In it the author points out the infinite, and is insistent on the divine in any event or philosophy.

In spite of the fact that a number of works on Greek history, literature, or art have appeared since the publication by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. of "The Mycenean Age," by Tsountas and Manatt, in 1897, that work is still considered the standard. It the most recent book dealing with Greek discoveries W. G. Lawton, the author, calls "The Hellenic Age," which, then, Dr. Schliemann's own book.

The newly elected Mayor of this city, George B. McClellan, will have his essay, "The Oligarchy of Venice," issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. early in the Spring. In it the author, the publishers say, will be revealed as "a scholar and political thinker." He has been well known to the public for many years as Congressman and member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, while his friends know him as a linguist and as being familiar with European history.

Speaking of Christmas books in his column in the current Literary World, Ellen Carman says: "And Christmas books, mark you, should always be gay books, glad, bright, human, joyous, beautiful, kindly, and heartening. . . . I would rather have Euclid then Bede in my Christmas stocking, and I would rather have the 'Bab Ballads' then either. . . . It is the season of the pantomime; let me have a free foot for my fancy; let me have the careless gladness which belongs to children and born artists."

In the revised edition of his history of New York, in Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s American Commonwealth Series, Miss H. Roberts of the United States Treasury Department devoted much attention to the commanding position New York now occupies. He shows that the daily transactions on the New York Stock Exchange during 1902 were 60 per cent. greater than those of the London 'Change for the same period. Of the State, moreover, he says: "Save only Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, the Commonwealth of New York heads all nations in value of manufacturing products and aggregate wealth."

Henry Harrison Lewis has written a paper for a year number of Harper's Magazine, in which he tells of the derelicts—the half-sunken wrecks which imperil ocean travel—and of the methods by which these derelicts are destroyed.

Prof. Charles S. Sargent, whose new work on "Trees and Shrubs" is in course of publication by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., spent the Summer in Siberia studying the flora and fauna of that country. He is now in Hawaii and expects to be back in Boston by Christmas.

M. Paoli, the celebrated French special Commissary of Police who accompanies Kings, Queens, Princes, and other great personages during their tours through France, is about to publish in Paris the first volume of his memoirs. In this volume he confines himself to narrating everything interesting relative to the visits of the late Queen Victoria to the South of France. The volume, it is said, will be first submitted to King Edward VII. before its appearance in public.

B. H. Young, author of "Sally of Missouri," published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., is Miss Rose B. Young, well known to magazine readers by her short stories. She has written a new book, "Henderson," the scenes of which are also laid in Missouri. It will be published early in the Spring.

Prof. Rutherford of McGill University, one of the foremost living scientists, has written an interesting article on "The Disintegration of the Radio-active Elements" for the January number of Harper's Magazine.

Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, author of "The Gentle Reader," recently issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., is writing the "Life of Lowell" for the American Men of Letters Series.

Nina Rhoden, the author of "Silver Linings," the story of a blind girl's fortunes and misfortunes, published by McClure, Phillips & Co., has been blind since infancy. She is said to be a born story teller, having written since early childhood. Her first novel was written when she was sixteen, but her first published story came out three years ago as "Only Dollie." Miss Rhoden says that "Silver Linings" is not the story of her life, as has been suggested, although the heroine's experiences during her childhood were suggested by some of her own.

Dr. David Gregg, author of "Individual Prayer as a Working Force," announced to his congregation last week his acceptance of the Presidency of the Western Theological Seminary, to which position he was elected a short time ago.

Gelett Burgess, author with Will Irwin of "The Reign of Queen Isyl," published by McClure, Phillips & Co., was born in 1866. He was educated in the public schools and attended the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. After he was graduated he was for three months instructor in topographical drawing in the University of California, and then became designer of furniture; then editor of The Lark; then he became famous through "The Purple Cow"; later he started two more periodicals, Le Petit Journal des Refusés and Phyllida, the latter a bi-weekly on the lines of The London Spectator. He served a term on The London Sketch, and has written continuously in New York magazines. He most recently edited a volume of essays entitled "The Romance of the Commonplace." As an artist he is known by his "Goops."

Clarence Ludlow Brownell, author of "The Heart of Japan," which McClure, Phillips & Co. are publishing, lived in the Island Empire five years, principally as a teacher in little villages on the west coast, where he met no other man of his own color. After he left Japan he returned to America, doing newspaper work on the Pacific Coast and in New York, finally coming to London, where he now lives. He was born in Hartford, Conn.
